RECENT PHILOSOPHY.

Philosophical Remains of George Croom Robertson. Edited by Alexander Bain and T. Whittaker. (Williams & Norgate.)

A Study of Ethical Principles. By James Seth. (Blackwoods.)

Aspects of Pessimism. By R. M. Wenley. (Blackwoods.)

THE late Prof. Croom Robertson must have been known at least by name to every student of philosophy in Britain, and perhaps even in America; but to the outside world he was not even a name. In the course of a most laborious life he published only one book, a small but golden monograph on Hobbes; with the exception of one article in the Fortnightly, and another in the Nineteenth Century, he wrote nothing for the great reviews; while his contributions to Mind, the journal which he edited with distinguished ability for sixteen years, though replete with thought and learning, were even less calculated to attract the attention of the outside world than the average discussions that first see the twilight in the pages of that excellent periodical.

But again, considered simply as a philosopher, Croom Robertson occupied a somewhat peculiar position. He was not like James Mill the pioneer, nor like John Mill the victorious champion of a new school, nor, although education and circumstances seem to have marked him out for that office, was he like Prof. Henry Sidgwick, its defender against the ever-growing forces of reaction. It would be vain to look among these remains for any theory of mental phenomena at once original and comprehensive, or even for any penetrating criticism of accepted beliefs. One finds more convincing than convincingness. Croom Robertson began life as an adherent of the Associationist Psychology with the extensions given to it by Mr. Spencer. At its close he seems quite content to watch the ruins of the edifice tumbling about his head. If he had a favourite thesis it was that "there is nothing in Kant's philosophical analysis [of the perception of space and of external objects] . . . for which a positive psychological warrant cannot now be assigned; while it is psychology that gives the clearest demonstration of the limits that should be placed upon his assertions (especially as to the universality of the space-form as regards 'external' sense)" (p. 273)—

a thought that will be found partially worked out in the admirable article on "Axioms" reprinted from the Encyclopædia

Britannica. But in a paper on the "Psychological Theory of Extension" (first published in 1888, pp. 279-287 of the present volume) Croom Robertson, in deference to the criticisms of Messrs. James and Ward, gives up the derivation of space-perception from the sensations accompanying movement, and proposes to rest it solely on the sense of resistance; as if the consciousness of a resisting object did not involve the consciousness of space, as if this assumption of a something felt as outside and opposite to ourselves did not involve a complete surrender to the intuitionist theory of cognition!

The truth is, that Croom Robertson was better fitted to trace out the genesis and evolution of philosophical opinions than to estimate their absolute value as representatives of reality; his acquaintance with the history of philosophy was extensive, minute, and accurate; he is always clearer and more interesting when reviewing past systems than as a critic or exponent of contemporary thought. Unfortunately, want of leisure and failing health debarred him from producing any great work on this subject. But perhaps his character and abilities were such as would not have found full expression in any theoretical occupation. His was properly a directing, organising genius; and, for that reason, philosophy was to him not so much the science of ultimate realities, as the supreme animating principle by which all other branches of intellectual activity and all the higher practical pursuits should be directed and inspired. To stimulate the minds of others and to carry on a propaganda for the study of philosophy was perhaps more congenial to him than original production. Such, as it seems to me, is the true interpretation of a characteristic mentioned by Mr. Leslie Stephen:

"As editor of Mind he expended an amount of thought and labour upon the revision of articles which surprised anyone accustomed to more rough-and-ready methods of editing. Besides correcting misprints or inaccuracies of language, he would consider the writer's argument carefully, point out weak places, and discuss desirable emendations as patiently as the most industrious tutor correcting the exercises of a promising pupil. Contributors were sometimes surprised to find that their work was thought deserving of such elaborate examination; and it often seemed to me that he could have written a new article with less trouble than it took him to put into satisfactory shape one already written, with which, after all, he perhaps did not agree" (p. 21).

Equally characteristic is the prominence given to the social factor in the essay, entitled "How we come by our Knowledge" (pp. 63-74); and if in this respect Croom Robertson represented the true tradition of Socrates, he also exhibited in private life the highest type of Stoic fortitude. For an account of the cheerful heroism with which he bore up against hopeless suffering and irremediable loss, I must refer to the beautiful and touching pages contributed by Mr. Leslie Stephen to the memoir of his much-lamented friend.

Moralists of all schools have so much in common that Prof. James Seth's eloquent volume may be read with considerable sympathy by many who do not share his special point of view. The writer belongs to that new Scottish school whose method may be described as a graceful and scholarly eclecticism, rather conservative in speculation, if rather radical in politics. For this school the way of salvation no longer comes from Hegel nor even from Kant. Prof. Seth has the merit of clearly seeing that the old spiritualist dogmas are as incompatible with the metaphysics of Prof. Caird, Mr. Bradley, and even of T. H. Green, as with the agnosticism of Mill and Spencer. For him there is no sure ethical foundation without free will in the most absolute sense, a personal God, and an immortal soul. So strong, indeed, are his prejudices on this subject that he cannot accept the lead of Aristotle in ethics without forcing his own faith in immortality on that most reluctant philosopher (p. 415). Not that Prof. Seth can be accused, generally speaking, of an undue tendency to read Christian or modern ideas into the Greek mind. On the contrary, he systematically exaggerates the interval dividing it from our own. "For both Plato and Aristotle," he tells us, "the ideal life was a life of speculation or intellectual contemplation, in which no place was found for practical activity or the play of the ordinary sensibilities" (p. 274). How little true this is of Plato we may learn from a noble passage in Book vi. of the Republic, in which the work of the philosopher, who, withdrawn from an evil world, "does his own business," though allowed to be great, is yet pronounced "not the greatest, for in a state which is suitable to him he will be the saviour of his country, as well as of himself." As to the assertion that Aristotle found no place for the play of the ordinary sensibilities in his ideal life, it seems incredible that anyone who had ever read the Ethics could make it. Prof. Seth, indeed, seldom lays hands on the Greek philosophers without misrepresenting them grossly. They "had no sphere of private morality" (p. 18). "The ancients had not yet separated the individual from his society, and to them accordingly the two interests were one and the same" (p. 19).

"The Greeks did not contemplate the possibility of any real conflict between the individual and the social Good. . . . A life of complete self-culture was the Greek ideal; and one could never be called upon to sacrifice any part of this life for the sake of 'doing good' to his fellow-men" (p. 295).

This of the people who created the word ἡμετέραν πόλιν! "The classical world had no idea of a non-political society" (p. 298). Observe that "classical" is here opposed to "modern," and so includes the Stoics. "The poets are condemned [by Plato] in the interests of Truth rather than Goodness" (p. 275). As our author refers us to the first book of the Republic for Plato's "impressive picture" of the just man misrepresented and persecuted (p. 150), it may be inferred that he has not been lately studying the Dialogues. As usual with writers of this school, classical antiquity is thrown into deep shadow to enhance by contrast the high lights of Christianity. But even the latter does not escape misconstruction. To the Early Church "matter is essentially evil" (p. 164); although, singularly enough, "Christianity sees in matter the very vehicle of the divine revelation" (p. 202).

When to Prof. Seth's natural genius for blundering is added the animosity of a philosophical partisan, it can be imagined how disastrous are the results. It suits his purpose to describe Hedonism, even under the form of modern Utilitarianism, as a mere ethics of sensibility. Accordingly, the claim of its supporters to use reason, even as interpreted by the principles of the associationist psychology, is denied; and they are apparently to be debarred from including in their analysis of the feelings those complex pleasures which accompany the higher intellectual activities. "Mill and Bain resolve our entire experience into feeling or sensibility." They would "disallow the distinction between reason and sensibility, and maintain that the former differs from the latter only in respect of its greater complexity, that 'reason' so-called is but the complex product of associated feelings" (p. 119).

Here the distinction between feelings and the relations between feelings is ignored. But, apart from that, what have our theories about the origin of reason to do with its bearing on our ethical theories, and why may not the sensationalist psychologist prefer "a rationally guided life" to "a life whose sole guide and sovereign master is sensibility" (ib.), just as much as Aristotle or Prof. Seth? As well might Prof. Max Müller forbid advocates of the bow-wow theory of language to express themselves in any other way than by barking; as well might Prof. Mivart oblige those who accept the undulatory theory of light to shut their eyes and feel their way about with their hands. Once remove this initial misunderstanding, and all Prof. Seth's objections to Hedonism as an ethical method fall to the ground. Its watchword is not, as he says, "self-gratification"; nor is the self that it seeks to realise the merely "sentient self" (p. 204). It does not "find the moral criterion in the individual subject" (p. 220); nor does it admit that "my own pleasure alone has significance for me" (p. 140). It does not "reduce the difference between virtue and vice to one between prudence and imprudence," nor "the right to the expedient" (pp. 124 and 408). It may agree with the author that "uninstructed feeling is incompetent for the discharge of such a splendid task" as rising to complete sympathy with our fellows (p. 139); but then it claims equally with him to draw on all the resources of feeling "illuminated and instructed by rational insight" (ib.); and, therefore, "an ultimate vindication of obligation" is no more "impossible" to it than it is to him (p. 127). So far as this goes, indeed, it could not well be worse off than he is; for his proof of morality consists throughout in the assumption that it is natural, reasonable, ideal, and so forth. What he very justly remarks of intuitionism, that "it is a mere re-statement, in philosophical terms, of the ordinary moral consciousness" (p. 187), applies with equal force to his own position. His new commandment, "Be a Person" (p. 211), will not come as a very luminous direction to ordinary human beings, who will suppose that they have already sufficiently fulfilled it by "taking the trouble to be born," and whose ideal is now rather to be personages. It is true that subsequent explanations reduce this oracular summons to something very like "Act conscientiously"—advice for which we need not have gone beyond the pages of Bishop Butler. The chief difference is that Butler was too clear-headed and candid to add, as Prof. Seth does, though not quite in so many words: "and be sure at least to make believe that you always enjoy it."

Mr. Wenley writes, on the whole, as an opponent of Pessimism. But the effect of his book, so far as it goes, is to make out a still stronger case for those who hold that life is not worth living. They at least left unimpaired the pleasures that arise from the study of literature and philosophy: Mr. Wenley, to the best of his abilities, robs us even of these. Having chosen for discussion some of the most delightful subjects in the world—Job, Ecclesiastes, the Imitation, Hamlet, Faust, Berkeley, and Schopenhauer—he has so swathed them in wisps of dusty disquisition that not a ray of interest is suffered to reach the mind of his reader. "Exceptionally great men," he tells us, "are often unfortunate in their critics" (p. 128). They have never been more unfortunate than in the present instance. Neither his logical studies nor his familiarity with great literary models have taught Mr. Wenley to observe the most elementary rules of composition. Speaking about the Latin Church of the thirteenth century, he pompously informs us that "prejudice alone can lead one to allege that the ecclesiastical organisation was at this time guiltless of aught but hypocrisy and every species of sin" (p. 56). Of what else could it have been guiltless? And is not hypocrisy, then, a species of sin? We hear of an influence that in certain circumstances would have been "greatly minimised" (p. 85); and of a "moral diremption that has pressed so hard in recent years" (p. 134). In Goethe's early works "evaporation of ideals is conspicuous by its absence" (p. 137). Hartmann asks "how one can participate in the personality of Christ," and "answers the question with a display of learning and ingenuity which would be whimsical were it not for its graceless blasphemy" (p. 310). A substitution of similars will make the absurdity of this last construction still more apparent. Replacing "graceless blasphemy" by its exact equivalent, "disagreement with Mr. Wenley's religious opinions," we may ask how such a disagreement can be predicated of a display of learning, or how it can prevent that display from being whimsical? On the next page we are relieved to learn that another argument of Hartmann's is "not so offensive," and "has an air of solidity due to the fact that redaction of history is absent, and a brand new edifice is being gradually put together." How can an edifice be "brand new" before it is completed?

It will have been gathered from one of the foregoing extracts that the evaporation of bigotry, so honourably characteristic of recent Scottish thought, is conspicuous by its absence from this book. Mr. Wenley seems even to deny that anyone who can put such a question as that quoted from Hartmann has a right to discuss religion—an exclusion which, if consistently carried out, would singularly limit the field of theological controversy. Another disqualifying circumstance urged against Hartmann is the intellectualism that seeks to reduce Christianity to "a mere concatenation of discursive formulae." "Yet," the critic goes on, "this very intellect is the chief means whereby Hartmann rids himself of Christianity" (p. 311). One pities the Glasgow students who were formerly examined in philosophy by a logician who is scandalised to find the intellect used to break up "a concatenation of discursive formulae." One is sorry also that the students of Queen Margaret College, Glasgow, are still taught philosophy by a lecturer who can represent Spinoza as saying that "the mutually exclusive modes [sic] of thought and extension have always proceeded from God," and as calling mind and matter "emanations from deity" (p. 177); and who, confounding pessimism with agnosticism, sums up the creed of its German teachers in the phrase, "human nature cannot escape misery and death—evil in all kinds—any more than finite intellect can grasp truth or know reality" (p. 130). The whole subsequent criticism of Schopenhauer and Hartmann—gnostics, if ever any men deserved the name—is a virtual retraction of this jaunty epigram. I must not omit to mention Mr. Wenley's own luminous contribution to the controversy on the value of life. It consists, according to him, "precisely in the kind of living whereby men impart worth to existence" (p. 300). Whatever this may mean, the Pessimists ought to be perfectly satisfied with his willing admission that "if the Absolute Being be impersonal, the gospel of despair necessarily follows" (p. 318). But perhaps on this point the opinion of Matthew Arnold will have more weight than that of Mr. Wenley.

ALFRED W. BENN.

Eighteenth Century Vignettes. Second Series.
By Austin Dobson. (Chatto & Windus.)

MR. AUSTIN DOBSON'S second series of "Vignettes" has all the characteristic charms and virtues of his first. There is the same exquisite homeliness and delighted familiarity with his themes; the same zest and pleasure in the mere mention or enumeration of the men and things so dear to him; the same simplicity of artfulness and wealth of knowledge.

This volume is mainly devoted to themes somewhat less famous and important than those of its predecessor. Swift, Richardson, Smollett, Johnson, are indeed among the intimates of every reader; but the Paynes, and Dodsley, and Roubillac, the Duc de Nivernais and Lady Mary Coke, Silas Told ("the Prisoners' Chaplain") and Chodowiecki ("the Berlin Hogarth"), are not household words with that ill-read person, the modern reader: at least, he does but recognise some of them as names and as little more.

Two of the papers upon these less known figures are the choice and master pieces of the book: those which tell the singular lives and fortunes of Lady Mary Coke and of Silas Told. True children, both, of the eighteenth century, the century of Horace Walpole and of John Wesley, of dazzling Ranelagh and of ghastly Newgate! Silas is a most moving hero, and illustrates certain social aspects of the time with an extraordinary vividness. "No man," said Johnson, and Smollett partly confirms him, "no man will be a sailor who has contrivance enough to get himself into a gaol." Silas learned very completely, in his sturdy and admirable life, either extreme of horror as it flourished in the last age. Lady Mary is an eccentric of a typical sort: a little charming, a little mad, intensely individual. For some not quite explicable reason, one is led to fancy that a companion portrait of the remarkable Elizabeth Chudleigh, Duchess of Kingston, would be a good subject for Mr. Dobson's ingenious art.

In the Paynes and Dodsley one of the dearest features of the last century is seen: its men of "the trade" and of the arts connected with it. Tom Payne, bookseller, a more pleasing person than his namesake of another spelling; Roger Payne, squalid liver and true artist; Robert Dodsley, footman, poet, bookseller: these are men upon whom Mr. Dobson dwells with a peculiar zeal. "The worthy, modest, and ingenious Mr. Robert Dodsley," as Boswell has it, is worthily celebrated in the essay "At Tully's Head." With Tom Davies, his brother bibliopole, he shares the esteem of all Johnsonians; and, as Mr. Dobson shows, he was honourably connected with great men of letters, from Pope to Burke. Not the least happy poem in his own famous Collection is his "Cave of Pope: a Prophecy."

"Then, some small Gem, or Moss, or shining Ore, Departing, each shall pilfer, in fond hope
To please their Friends, on ev'ry distant Shore, Boasting a Relick from the Cave of Pope."

The vignettes of Roubillac, Nivernais, and Chodowiecki introduce us to three variously eminent foreigners; and there is apt to be a curious fascination about certain foreigners of the last century. Thanks to that departed institution, the "Grand Tour," and to the traditional influences, first of Italian and Spanish, then of French literature, upon our own, old England, upon the literary and aristocratic side, seems more cosmopolitan in a sensible and easy way, than the England of later times. Roubillac was no Handel of sculpture, but the quaint and affected little Frenchman is no less closely associated with England. Truly, "his terrors want dignity, his affrightments are without decorum"; but, like Bernini, he was bad in the grand style, with infinite ingenuity. Nivernais, thin and pallid and elegant, is one of the irresistibly pleasing French great gentlemen whom we love to meet in memoirs: cultured, courtly, able, and at ease. He wrote, says Walpole, not without a favourable prejudice, "the genuine French spoken by the Duc de la Rochefoucault and Mme. de Sévigné, and not the metaphysical galimatias of La Harpe and Thomas, &c., which Mme. du Deffand protested she did not understand."

The noble and accomplished diplomatist,

Chesterfield's paragon, makes an attractive figure in these pages; and so does the homelier Franco-Polish German, of whose art Mr. Dobson discourses with the felicity proper to the critic of Hogarth, Bewick, Dürer. The Journal to Stella, the most pathetic relic of Swift, so full of an almost sacred secrecy of affection, mixed with the liveliest portraiture and wit, suggests to Mr. Dobson no new conception of Swift's character or history; but he dexterously selects from its abundance of good things. To Richardson, fat and sleek in his feminine circle, shocked and furious at Tom Jones, Mr. Dobson is kinder than the critics are wont to be. And surely anything may be forgiven to the creator of "Clarisse, beauté sainte où respire le ciel," as Chénier sang: even his somewhat petty outcries and underhand dealings against his lusty and magnificent rival are at least intelligible, when we dispassionately consider the provocation of Joseph Andrews. It is easy to laugh at Richardson's squeamishness and finical propriety: but two such opposed and dissimilar men, as Johnson and Gray, agreed with one another and with him, in their estimates of the rivals, not upon artistic grounds alone.

"Dr. Johnson's Library" furnishes Mr. Dobson with a genial topic: by the side of his paper may be enjoyed one by Mr. A. W. Hutton, read before the Johnson Club two years ago in Oxford. The Doctor was in literal truth, as Boswell's uncle said of him, "a robust genius, born to grapple with whole libraries." Mr. Dobson repeats some of the pleasant scenes in which Boswell shows him to us robustly grappling with his own and with others' books; he does not quote the locus classicus upon the subject, Beauclerk's letter to Lord Charlemont:

"We cannot do without you. If you do not come here, I will bring all the Club over to Ireland to live with you, and that will drive you here in your own defence. Johnson shall spoil your books, Goldsmith pull your flowers, and Boswell talk to you: stay then if you can."

In their treatment of books, Johnson and Wordsworth were for once alike: both cut the pages with a greasy knife, both cared nothing for decent bindings, and clean copies, and all the graces or fopperies of the bookshelf.

The Smollett essay follows, with happy comment and illustration, the peregrination of Mr. Matthew Bramble and his queer, quaint, charming company, upon their most delightful and, but for some necessary love-making, most unsentimental journey. This is a curiously characteristic example of Mr. Dobson's manner. Merely to linger fondly over the old pages, to dwell lovingly upon the old names and places, is enough for him. The Bath! what memories, what associations, the phrase embalms, from days before Smollett up to Northanger Abbey, Persuasion, Pickwick! Simply to set down some of such memories, with the taste and essence of a whole century in them, is to Mr. Dobson no less inspiring than to Walt Whitman a sonorous roll-call of the world's tribes and continents.

If the reader be uninterested, or cry out for a moral and a criticism of life, Mr. Dobson is not his man; he must turn to Mr. Lecky or Mr. Leslie Stephen. Such an one will care little for the minute picture of Ranelagh, which is so fitting a counterpiece to that of Vauxhall in the earlier volume. As ever, Mr. Dobson is a learned and loving topographer: the famous haunt, which we meet in an hundred novels, memoirs, essays, satires, is rebuilt before our very eyes. We have more than a suspicion, that it was a trifle indecorous, and a trifle dull, except when Arne, "lean and angular, with florid complexion and elongated chin," or Burney from the neighbouring Hospital, dispensed choice music. In the amusing Lessons for the Day we have some pleasing sketches of Ranelagh and Vauxhall:

"And we drew near unto the Theatre; and as we entered the Theatre it so fell out that our Expectations were exceeded. Our Hearts leaped for Joy, and I said unto myself, See now what mighty Pleasures may be purchased for a Shilling! Where now is the Sorrow wherewith I sorrowed, or the Grief whereof I grieved? Surely Pain and Anguish are banished from this Circle: Trouble also and Sorrow have no Shilling to introduce them. And the Lamps were not disposed as thou seest them in the Street, a-row; but like unto the Stars that are in the Firmament. And the Organ played, and the Singers sung, and the Lamps blaz'd, and the Gilding glitter'd, and the Ladies looked, and I was fill'd with Joy; and I said, Is there now among the Sons of Men one that is happier than I? . . . As there is a Time to eat, and a Time to drink, and a Time for neither: and a Time to walk, and a Time to sit still, and a Time for neither: Even so there is a Time for Ranelagh, and a Time for Vauxhall: Is there not also a Time for neither? God forbid! Moreover I did eat and drink at Ranelagh, as I had before eaten and drunk at Vauxhall; but the Wine and the Drawers were an Abomination in both places. Now when I had walked the Circle of Ranelagh many Times, and had beheld the same Faces many Times, and the same Laces many Times: A sudden Weariness came upon me, and I began to moralise, and I said, Such also is the Circle of Life!"

When so pastoral a poet as the moral Blomfield is moved to satire, as Mr. Dobson tells us, by the monotonous mill-round of Ranelagh, we realise something of its fashionable ennui. And there is plenty of evidence that this theatre of ridotto and masquerade was given to a boisterous freedom of manners. Thus sings Laureate Whitehead in his "Song for Ranelagh":

"Ye belles, and ye flirts, and ye pert little things,
Who trip in this frolicsome round,
Pray tell me from whence this indecency springs,
The sexes at once to confound?
What means the cock'd hat and the masculine air,
With each motion designed to perplex?
Bright eyes were intended to languish, not stare,
And softness the test of your sex."

He concludes with a perhaps prophetic wisdom:

" . . . if Amazon-like you attack your gallants,
And put us in fear of our lives,
You may do very well for sisters and aunts,
But, believe me, you'll never be wives."

Let Mr. Dobson discourse to us of "the stately Pantheon"; and we shall have a perfect set of vignettes, carefully preserving and adorning the memory of London's elect and famous entertaining grounds. It is barely possible to criticise this kind of work: we can but express our pleasure, and, passibus haud aequis, let our fancies wander whither Mr. Dobson guides us. He knows each step of the way, he has friends in every street: the learned, the witty, the fair, the men of taste and ton, of arts and letters, bluestocking ladies and court toasts, Grub Street hacks and Cabinet Ministers, he greets them all. It is not possible to do anything better than exhort all to keep him company upon his sojournings and travellings in the great Augustan age. To be at once trustworthy and enchanting is to be one of a thousand.

LIONEL JOHNSON.

The Empire of the Tsars and the Russians.
By Anatole Leroy-Beaulieu. Translated from the Third French Edition of Zenaïde A. Ragozin. Vol. II. The Institutions. (G. Putnam's Sons.)

THE second volume of M. Leroy-Beaulieu's classical work on Russia here makes its appearance in the version of Mme Ragozin. The sense of the original is conveyed with vigour and accuracy, and the translator has added many valuable notes to assist the Western reader; but we cannot help wishing that her text were more free from Americanisms. It would be invidious to make a catalogue of these deviations from standard English; but certainly such words as "obsequiosity," "longanimity," and "unbeknown" should never have been allowed to find a place in her pages. These expressions are taken at random; many more could have been added, and we can only regret that Mme. Ragozin should in this way have disfigured her spirited version of a valuable book.

The work of M. Leroy-Beaulieu has long since won its place as a classic, and not much need be said by way of review. It is an absolutely fair book; and in consequence does not please the advanced Russophobic of the Western type, whereas on the other hand it is forbidden by the censorship in Russia itself. The second volume, dealing with the institutions of the country, does not contain such picturesque details as the first, which treats ethnology mainly; or the third, which discusses the religious question. But perhaps the information which it contains is more solid and important in the development of the country. The opinions of our author are well worth the consideration of Western thinkers.

It will be observed that M. Leroy-Beaulieu builds no very sanguine hopes upon the Mir. On the other hand he is loud in his praise of the Zemstvo, the provincial assembly founded by Alexander II. Although this institution has not fulfilled all the hopes which it raised, it seems, nevertheless, to contain the nucleus of self-government. Some Russians have, indeed, believed that by expansion it might bring about the revival of the Zemskaya Duma of old Russian history. Owing to the wide extent and various peoples of the Russian empire, it has been found occasionally expedient to put a new institution upon its trial in certain governments only. Such has been the case with the Zemstvo. M. Leroy-Beaulieu has much to tell us about the poverty of these "county councils," if we may so translate the word. They suffered a great deal in consequence of the sacrifices entailed upon them during the last Russo-Turkish war. Indeed, from these facts, among many others, we can see that it was no mere selfish impulse which led the Russians to undertake the responsibilities of that memorable struggle. They are a people capable of self-sacrifice for ideas, and our author dwells with pleasure on the enthusiasm of the peasant-members of the Zemstvo for public education. Although many of them are uneducated, they are willing to endure privations to ensure advantages to their children. The Zemstvos have also done much to improve the sanitary condition of the villages. The employment of women doctors is also to their credit, for up to quite recent times medicine was in a very backward condition in Russia. The medicine man and the wise woman were triumphant. But such, indeed, is the case in many other European countries, and was till quite recently in our own. Have we entirely got rid of the doctor who works by magic and the herbalist? Persons among us only just past middle age can remember the talismans in vogue to avert diseases in rural places. We certainly have not yet seen the last of folk-medicine.

After the Zemstvos our author betakes himself to the discussion of the new legal court which he rightly calls one of the corner-stones of the new Russia. It was in the judicial improvements which he carried out that Alexander II. earned some of his best laurels. The opening of the courts, the re-introduction of trial by jury—for it is really a very old institution in Russia, being mentioned in the Russkaya Pravda of Yaroslav—and the permission of the employment of advocates, were all steps in advance. The curious thing is that these advocates need not necessarily be, as in England, members of a close corporation whose privileges are jealously guarded; but any outsider may address the court, provided that he have a certificate for so doing. While deploring the system of the election of judges, introduced by Alexander II., M. Leroy-Beaulieu does not fail to make some severe remarks upon the same custom in America. Very interesting are the accounts given of the volost courts, which are under the control of the peasants, who administer a simple but efficacious justice based upon customary law. No one will deny the importance of such law. It has always been the policy of wise legislators to tamper with it as little as possible. The eminent legist, M. Bogisich, has said that, when called upon to compile a code for the Montenegrins, he made it a principle to incorporate as much customary law as he could. The remarks of our author on the ecclesiastical courts are interesting; the Emperor of Russia has never been as much head of the Orthodox Church as Queen Victoria is of the Anglican.

Gradually the bar in Russia has become a powerful institution, and many of its members have shown honesty and fearlessness. Among the number of these must certainly be mentioned M. Vladimir Spasovich, whose forensic speeches have been collected in several volumes. It is to be regretted that, in consequence of the acquittal of Vera Zazulich and other notorious prisoners, the freedom of the court has been crippled. M. Leroy-Beaulieu has many things to tell us about the knout, most of which will appear strange to those persons who are content to know Russia only from the malignant representations of her enemies. He considers that in reality no country has been milder to its criminals. Capital punishment was abolished as far back as 1753; and terrible as Siberia may seem with its wastes of snow, M. Leroy-Beaulieu says, with truth, that it is less injurious to health than the swamps of Cayenne and the pestilential deserts to which French prisoners were condemned under the Empire. The knout has been abolished since the days of Alexander I. Even the journey of the convicts, which appeared so full of hardship, is now modified by a sea voyage. Our author thinks that the Siberian convicts suffer less than the French (p. 412). And all this is said in a book frequently so hostile to Russia that it cannot pass the censorship there!

We have hardly space to say much about the press-laws. It is curious that the Russians had their first newspaper much about the same time as we had ours. It dates from the days of Alexis, the father of Peter the Great, a considerable part of whose reign was contemporary with the Protectorate, when the first Diurnal appeared. To anyone acquainted with Russia it is curious to see what things do escape the notice of the censor sometimes. The present writer has occasionally seen in the reading-rooms of hotels some of the most Russophobic articles of the Times: the black stamp of the censor had never reached them. After all, Russia does not stand alone in this respect: we remember the confiscation of a number of the Neue Freie Presse in Austria in 1888 for an article on Maria Theresa, whose career we should have thought had now become very old history.

The sixth book of this work, which concludes the volume, deals with the revolutionary elements in Russia, and will undoubtedly be read with great interest. In that country of contraries and unsolved problems, we meet with the difficulty not unknown in Western Europe—that of the educated proletariat. Education is very cheap in Russia, so that the humblest may enjoy its advantages. But there are few careers open to the masses; and, indeed, as the German Emperor is reported to have said, no government, however liberal and comprehensive, could find a career for so many candidates. A large number of these students are assisted by bursaries, some of which have been founded by members of the imperial family: indeed, some of the assassins of the Emperor Alexander II. belonged to this category. Many of these young men, whose heads are already filled with fantastic notions, finding that their learning profits them nothing, turn Nihilists. It is curious to see in any large Russian newspaper—let us take the Novoe Vremya, for instance—the great number of candidates for private tutorships. They are willing to teach all possible subjects for the smallest pittance. The pity is that they swell the ranks of the disaffected.

We may confidently recommend this interesting and suggestive book to the notice of our readers.

W. R. MORFILL.

"POPULAR COUNTY HISTORIES."—A History of Lancashire. By Lieut.-Col. Henry Fishwick. (Elliot Stock.)

To write the history of Lancashire in a single volume of moderate size is a difficult undertaking, and Col. Fishwick has probably succeeded as well as the nature of the case will admit. For while the earlier annals present the same variety of interest and the same kind of problems to be solved by consideration and research as in other counties, Lancashire differs from the greater part of England in the modern character of the development to which it owes its importance in the present day. Thus, if we take Manchester as a typical case, although it has been in existence from Roman times, and was even a notable place in the Tudor period, yet the enormous growth and development which gives it a place among the great cities of the world only began a little more than a century ago with the inventions that revolutionised the textile industries and led to the factory system. In 1783 an observant native describes "a firm-built and capital engine-house" where "Mr. Arkwright's machines are setting to work by a steam engine for carding and spinning of cotton." This was the first Manchester "factory." It is clear that either the earlier or the later part of the story must be more or less curtailed. Col. Fishwick has made his choice, and closes his narrative with "the dawn of the nineteenth century." Even under more favourable circumstances the volumes in the present series can only correspond to the introduction with which the old-fashioned county history—now hopelessly extinct—was furnished.

"I have endeavoured," says Col. Fishwick, "to confine myself as far as possible to the history of the county as a whole, and have not allowed myself to go into personal or local details, except when such were required to illustrate the subject in hand."

This very correctly describes the method adopted. The style is simple and unpretentious, and if it lacks the brilliance of Mr. George Saintsbury's volume on Manchester, it is direct, and will not easily be misunderstood. That Col. Fishwick is a painstaking and capable antiquary is known from his previous writings, and this book will not detract from the reputation he has acquired in that direction. There is a very careful summary of the information given in Domesday Book as to Lancashire. The oft-repeated statement that Flemish weavers were settled in Lancashire in the fourteenth century does not meet with the credence of our author. On the other hand, he accepts the statements of Henry de Walton as to the ravages of the Black Death in Amounderness, although the figures, except for the purpose of showing that there was a great mortality, seem to be of little precise value. Adam de Kirkham was the proctor of the archdeacon during the pestilence. His accounts not being satisfactory, the archdeacon submitted to a jury a document in which he states, always in round numbers, how many people died, how many were intestate, how many left wills, &c. In ten parishes there are 13,180 deaths between September, 1349, and the following January. The archdeacon claimed £289, and the jury awarded him £48 10s. But when we are told that there were 3,000 deaths in Preston, 3,000 in Kirkham, 800 in Pulton, 3,000 in Lancaster, 2,000 in Garstang, 1,000 in Cockerham, 140 in Lytham, 80 in St. Michael's, and 60 in another Poulton, we are clearly dealing with assertions that cannot, and probably were not intended to be, taken literally. "The numbers," as Dr. Creighton observes, "had obviously been put in for a forensic purpose, and are, of course, not even approximately correct for the actual mortality." It would be interesting to have precise data as to the real extent of the ravages of the Great Pestilence, but it is quite impossible to accept these figures as "fairly correct." That the mortality was very great is indisputed, and comes out in the mention of nine benefices in the district as having been vacant, three of them twice. The statistical sense was in a somewhat rudimentary condition, it is to be feared, in the fourteenth century. The Statute of Labourers, which was enacted to prevent the increase of wages under the new economic conditions caused by the Black Death, affords a glimpse into the agricultural condition of the county which is significant. Along with the labourers of other specified districts, the Lancashire men were allowed to go elsewhere in search of employment during the harvest time, "as they were wont to do before this time," and as the Irish harvestmen do at the present day. By a curious threefold slip, Col. Fishwick tells us of our first English printer that John [read William] Caxton, in 1472 [read 1477], set up his press in London [read Westminster]. The reference to the Book of Sports omits to mention that it was drawn up by Bishop Morton, at Preston; and the re-issue of it, made by Charles I. on the advice of Laud, is described in somewhat ambiguous and perhaps misleading terms. For each period Col. Fishwick gives many illustrative facts. With the Tudor period the available material greatly increases, and the incidents of the Civil War are treated at length, and a large amount of space is also devoted to the Jacobite rebellions. After this a sketch is given of industrial progress. But the story of the present century is practically left untold, notwithstanding its importance in relation to the county and the nation.

If it be objected that Col. Fishwick has not shown the connexion between the history of Lancashire and the history of England—for even the emergence of the district as a shire is not described—he will probably reply that he had no intention of describing the part of Lancashire in the making of England. What he has done is to give a mass of detailed information as to the past of a county that has strongly marked characteristics, and an exceptional history, whether it be regarded from a constitutional or an industrial point of view.

The Lone Inn, &c. By Fergus Hume. (Jarrold.)

A Daughter of the King. By "Alien." (Jarrold.)

Broomieburn. By John Cunningham. (Innes.)

IN Ian Maclaren Mr. Barrie has found a formidable rival. I say rival, not imitator, because, although Drumtochty, with its essentially God-fearing, Dissenting community, recalls Thrums and the Auld Lichts, its historian looks at the world sympathetically from a different standpoint. Mr. Barrie writes like a layman, alive to the comedy and still more to the tragedy of the lives he examines so microscopically. Ian Maclaren, in spite of what may seem a disclaimer in one passage, writes like a clergyman, intensely interested in both the material and the spiritual welfare of his congregation, and, by virtue of his professional position, possessing a master-key to their souls. Herein, in fact, lies the strength of Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush. Ian Maclaren appears to have sounded the depths not only of the Scotch Presbyterian heart of hearts—that Mr. Barrie has done in a manner which even his rival has not surpassed—but of the Scotch (and Celtic) Presbyterian conscience. He deals here with folk in whose case, whether they are young or old, faith, not conduct, is three-fourths of life. Take the leading character in this volume—one of its especial charms is that the noteworthy persons whose portraits are given are not too numerous—take the young scholar who in the first story dies after a brief career of triumph; take his mother who does not mourn as one who has no hope; take that rather too Highland and too mystical elder, Donald Menzies; take the doctor who dies of incessant work: each and all derive their strength from their firm faith in an eternity that consoles for the griefs, injustices, and inequalities of time. Ian Maclaren draws these as they are. Hence it is, no doubt, that we have in his sketches little of the spontaneous but non-spiritual drollery which bubbles up in Mr. Barrie's best work. He has, however, a humour of his own, which he occasionally elaborates to the verge of caricatures, as in his description of the inhabitants of Drumtochty under rain. He has the command, too, of a most admirable and flexible style, capable of doing justice to every shade of Scotch religious life. But his main power is to be found in his faithful portraiture. Thus it is that in this volume there is scarcely a story that is not an absolute success. It strikes me that I have before read something like "The Transformation of Lachlan Campbell," which tells of the change made upon an austere man by the (apparent) transgression of his daughter. It appears to me, also, that there is rather too much of a good thing, in the sense of there being too much transcendental spirituality, in "A Highland Mystic." But the first sketch "Domsie," the story of "a lad o' pairts," and three-fourths of the last, "A Doctor of the Old School"—in the final chapter the Doctor recalls too readily the man cited by the mendacious captain in Peter Simple who lived with the death-rattle in his throat for six weeks—are delightful and artistically perfect. The Scotch laudator temporis acti could not do better than contrast Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush with Wilson's once extravagantly admired Lights and Shadows. Ian Maclaren will no doubt attain very great success in the original line which he has struck out for himself; he certainly deserves it.

Mr. Pinkerton's new romance calls for very high praise. It is carefully written; it does not contain too many portraits; and the narrative flows easily. The centre of the story is the French prisoner—it is the period of the Napoleon wars that is dealt with partially in this book—the Count de Frontinacq, who has ability and courage, and might have lived and died happily, had he not been burnt up with a mad passion for a girl already pledged to another, and, who, as a consequence, gives way to the base emotions of hatred and revenge. An admirable foil to him is presented in Rauning Revelstone, who is a really fine specimen of the English dare-devil seadog. But all the characters—including deep Davy Chard and the eccentric Pixie Jan—are well drawn, and their brandy-stealing expeditions and other adventures are vigorously reproduced. The spirit of Mr. Blackmore broods over the book, and especially over its female characters. But Mr. Pinkerton is no copyist: this romance is most decidedly all his own. And it is one of the brightest, compactest, and least pretentious that have appeared for a long time. There is certainly no good reason why Mr. Pinkerton should not take a leading place among present-day purveyors of historical fiction.

As a Man Sows indicates no falling off on the part of Mr. Westall in the art of devising sensational plots. The rush of incident is rather too bewildering. One would need to be a Sherlock Holmes or, at least, a Watson, to follow the "Old Man" who dominates As a Man Sows through the labyrinth of his villainies, which begin with a big financial swindle and end with the shooting of his "reformed" partner in crime, Rufus Junius, alias Langley, as a sort of tragic, but quite appropriate, sequel to the shooting of that partner's innocent wife, Ida. Mr. Westall displays his special skill in this portion of his story better than in any other; for it is difficult for a time to believe, after Langley's imprudent defiance of his other some time partner in crime, the "gipsy" Sol, that Ida's murderer can have been any other than that very considerable scoundrel. Then a large portion of the story is nothing more than a sort of hotch-potch of continental gambling and the American Civil War. Here Mr. Westall commits the not uncommon mistake of seeking to cover too much ground. The love affairs in As a Man Sows, both of Ida before she becomes Mrs. Langley, and of Irene, her daughter, are lame and, indeed, tame. On the other hand, Langley, as a man who is reformed, and tries by a good and, in the end, even beneficent life to atone for his past, is a successful portrait. It is finished, which cannot be said of every other character in the book, and least of all of that conventional fiend, Limbery Hicks. Some of the detective "business" is really good, though worked up in a too abrupt fashion. Mr. Westall has done better work than As a Man Sows. But it is, all the same, greatly superior to the ordinary railway novel.

The author of Aldersyde has had the courage in A Lost Ideal to leave the field of fiction in which she has gained most of her successes, and to try her fortune with a story the note of which is distinctly modern and almost "societyish." The result is certainly not a failure; but neither is it a complete and unmistakable success. One feels that in the end the creator of Woodgate has been far too kind to him. He is a cad and a cur, worse even than Kingsley's wretched poet, Vavasour; and a woman with the character and intellectual insight of Helen Lockhart would never have married such a man. Being Scotch, too, she would almost certainly have preferred to him Dr. Brian Laidlaw, the graduate of two universities, who, at the beginning of the story, is seen "riding leisurely up the beautiful road, following the windings of the Teviot from Hallkirk to Broadrule." In that case we should have had in all probability a really good Scotch story; the Northern characters, such as the country minister and a shrewd, severe old Scotch lady, have certainly more grit in them than the average "Annie Swan" men and women. But Mrs. Burnett-Smith has felt impelled to prove to the world that she is quite capable of grappling with certain "modern problems"; and so she shipwrecks Helen's happiness by allowing her to overhear her husband tell Hilda von Reutensee, "I love you with a mad love which is my ruin," and declare that he had married Helen because of the "long kindness" of her folk. Hilda, it is true, despises her would-be lover, honours Helen, and in time secures contentment for her eminently susceptible self. It is all over with Helen's life in the true sense, in spite of Woodgate's atonement and her own forgiveness, even in spite of her "laying her head, wife-like, upon his breast" in the last chapter. If Mrs. Burnett-Smith will try tragedy, let it be genuine and thorough-going.

There is a good deal of bright Irish character in Colour-Sergeant, No. 1 Company; there is also a fair amount both of pathos and of mystery. The central story is, however, of the simplest and most commonplace description. The handsome sergeant, who falls in love with the heroine and finds his love reciprocated, and who turns out to be a patrician in disguise, is a ridiculously familiar personage; and it would have been rather a disappointment if there had not been included in the final march past of the characters of the story "a tall, dark, soldierly-looking man and a most winsome lady by his side." "Between these two and by the mother's side," of course, "stands a bonnie little fellow of three summers, dark-eyed like his father, but with all Alison's sweetness in his radiant smile." The plot is saved, however—or, at least redeemed—by one or two of the minor characters, especially by a good priest, by the poor colleen Noah, by her unfortunate lover, Private Deacon, who is driven to madness and murder by brutal treatment, and by the very verdant but thoroughly good-hearted Ensign Green. Mrs. Leith-Adams ought, however, to have made a great deal more than she has done of her Fenian rising.

Mr. Fergus Hume is writing far too rapidly. In his new volume he figures simply as an imitator, purveying a quite conventional detective mystery and a no less conventional horror. Neither "The Lone Inn" nor "Professor Brankel's Secret" has a suggestion of the peculiar humour which, bubbling out of human nature, was the saving salt of The Mystery of a Hansom Cab. The second story, indeed, does not appear to have the merit even of originality: surely we have heard more than once before of the madman who requires the blood of a pure and innocent maiden to complete the effectiveness of some hell-broth that he is engaged in brewing. "The Lone Inn" is a much better story than "Professor Brankel's Secret." It is, indeed, a fair study in detectivism. But something better might have been expected of Mr. Hume than that he should make the plot of his story hinge on the fact of the two brothers, Felix and Francis Briarfield, being as much alike as the two proverbial peas.

It were the easiest thing in the world to make fun of A Daughter of the King: of the preposterous musician and his still more preposterous daughter, of the blind moralist Eric, of the wonderful place where "solitary cabbage trees stood near like sentinels and groups of tall poplars whispered together of secrets weird and strange, while from afar off came the requiem of the waves, the dirge that sobbed against the distant hills." In truth, "Alien" has given the public in this volume a great deal of confused writing—the result, no doubt, of hasty reading and thinking. And yet she is so obviously in earnest about so many things, including the power of duty and of music, that one hesitates to find serious fault with her. Several of the characters have something in them, though none is artistically perfect. Mrs. Arnold, who takes the orphan daughter of the musician to her home that she may aid in the discipline of her two sons, is flesh and blood of a kind. Even Florence, though she marries the wrong man and, in order to keep her daughter from her unloved husband, actually accuses herself of immorality, and though she gives way far too often to pious hysterics, has certain attractive qualities. But "Alien" ought to learn the art of constructing a plot before she publishes again. She has studied The Story of an African Farm neither wisely nor well.

In Broomieburn, Mr. Cunningham gives a number of Scotch Border sketches, which, without laying any claim to "moral earnestness," "psychological humour," or any of the distinguishing characteristics of modern fiction, are yet very natural and very entertaining. Certainly nothing better in their way have lately appeared than the opening account of a wrestling match, "Wooring by Proxy," or "Geordie on Escort Duty." A book of Scotch sketches is nowadays accounted incomplete which does not contain some "quaint" rustic views of religion; and the only chapter in Mr. Cunningham's volume in which he seems to strain a point is that in which he allows one of his characters to deal thus with the teaching of religion to the young:

"We speak o' oor Saviour as a bit babe, an' mair often o' Him as a man; but do we ever speak of Him as a boy? Think ye now, wad it no' be maist likely tae appeal tae the yaung if we spak o' Him as a bit boy playin' wi' his peerie, or hurlin' his gird about the streets o' Jerusalem?"

Broomieburn does not, however, contain much of this playing to the Scotch Kirk gallery. Mr. Cunningham contents himself, for the most part, with genuine realism with descriptions of muirland farms: and muirland courtships and muirland weddings. There is nothing forced about either his humour or his pathos. Broomieburn is a sound as well as modest piece of work.

SOME VOLUMES OF VERSE.

The Flute-Player, and Other Poems. By Francis Howard Williams. (G. P. Putnam's Sons.) If a young poet does not fall under the spell of some golden-mouthed master of the lyre, either originality or conceit is the chief feature in his composition. Very few are men of native power so imperative that they find it impossible to use in their early years of output the footprints of the great who have gone before. Nine out of ten who ask for recognition as singers remind listeners, by many a trill or whimsical utterance, of Tennyson and Browning, to go no farther back. The tune belongs to the master, the variation to the pupil; but it is by patience in the variations that the lesser bards grow to a more original vigour. Mr. Williams must, therefore, not be indignant if we begin our short review of his capable book by noting his indebtedness to the two supreme poets whose names we have just given. Tennyson's influence has been for good, as a glance at Mr. Williams's blank verse proves; but from Browning he has taken oddity in excess, without an excellence to balance it. To come closer to the author, we may say, without further discursiveness, that he is of the stuff of which poets are made. There are so many signs of distinctiveness in The Flute-Player, that we are able to offer Mr. Williams some bold advice. Let him throw Tennyson and Browning to the winds and be himself. This done, let him master his vocabulary, instead of allowing it to dominate him. Finally, let him beware of extravagant statement, for by reason of this fault he has spoiled some poems which otherwise would deserve praise of a quite unusual warmth. For instance, is no way to ejaculate when referring to the song of a robin. The word "Messiah" is pointless and out of taste. In the same poem occur "mobbed grief" and "collied depths." It is against this kind of want of workmanship that Mr. Williams must be on his guard; and we venture to emphasise our contention even to the point of appearing disagreeable, because we are so sure that The Flute-Player contains very many lovely snatches of poetry. Speaking of an early April morning, Mr. Williams says:—

"Messiah of the sky!
Incarnate rhapsody!"

"Thy jewels are half a frost and half a dew."

We quote the sestet of the sonnet in which this beautiful line occurs:—

"Dear Morning! with thy maid's hair unconfined

By virgin fillets of a later spring,
Risen as from a rounded dream to find
The world a-riot for a bourgeoning,
Thy eyes spill sleep and sunlight, while the wind

Beats blood to blushes with his gusty wing."

Some will think "a-riot" is a flaw, but certainly all will agree that the alliteration in the last line just prevents an exquisite conclusion.

Year by Year. By Mary L. Hankin. (Fisher Unwin.) Whereas many of the effects, though not his best, presented by Mr. Williams are the children of strain, Mrs. Hankin compels attention by using a gentle and a simple method. Her little book of poems proclaims its genuine birth on every page, and contains one or two pieces against which the most scrupulous critic would hardly venture to urge a single complaint. There is a kind of ornate trickery, which has for label "painter's poetry," that often deceives those who are not of the elect; but surely there are no better means of shaming this masquerader than such lyrics as we have before us. Emotions that are older than many a mountain move Mrs. Hankin to sing and to sigh. Sorrow has been in her house; her heart is the home of regret; sometimes even the blue sky is a weariness. Who has not found that life is made up of the dark and the bright? But it is not given to all to voice these feelings as Mrs. Hankin has been able to do. How much is expressed in these two stanzas from "May in Town":

"Where the sun is sleeping,
Through green pastures creeping,
Comes the smoke and wailing
Of the weary town.

Villas white and staring,
Mansions red and glaring,
Portico and paling,
Blot the breezy down.

"Sick of human speaking,
Desperate, eager seeking,
Vapid, shallow sallies,
Cruel, crushing truth,
Let me hear the ringing
Of the fountain springing
Down the happy valleys
Of my golden youth."

Nearly at the end of the book we found a poem which is a perfect example of restraint. It is hard to see how the recital of the incident could be bettered, and still harder to imagine a more delicate passage from the story to its moral. Quotation of "Water Springs in Dry Places" will be the finest comment:

"No crumb was left in the empty scrip,
The bottle was shrunk and dry,
The pitiless glare of an eastern noon
Poured down from the brazen sky,
As she left the lad on the desert sand
That she might not see him die.

"Emptied of life and of earthly hope,
The soul in her body dies,
When the sudden touch of an angel's hand
Is laid on her darkened eyes;
And she sees from the waste of burning sand
The waters of blessing rise!"

"When quenched the light of the busy brain,
The hope of the loving heart,
Those broken cisterns lie bare and dry,
That the waters of life may start,
And friend and comrade must stand aside
That God may take our part."

Poems New and Old. By William Roscoe Thayer. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) We gather from evidence supplied in this book that Mr. Thayer not now for the first time approaches the public with his literary wares. However this may be, we have not met with him before; but having met, we can only regret that the claims of space must make our record of the acquaintance so short a one. Still, though a notice be brief, remembrance is long; and we can perhaps comfort Mr. Thayer for this curt review by assuring him that some of his lines will go with us through life. "Halid," the poem with which his book commences, irresistibly recalls "The Voyage of Maeldune"; and if it is not nearly so fine as a whole, it contains lines which Tennyson would not have been ashamed to own. For instance, this of the sinking Pleiades:

"Dropt like dew from bough to bough of the cinnamon-trees."

And these of the dawn:

"I could count the veins on my hand; the horizon's raven shrouds Were dyed with purple and hemmed with gold, and anon the clouds

Were changed to a garden of flowers, more gorgeous than Shiraz knows—Tulips of wonderful hues, and heavenly bowers of rose!"

To what has been said may be added that Mr. Thayer at his worst does not mate Tennyson in his chief declensions. He has nothing to equal the appalling:

"And high in the heaven above it there flickered
a songless lark,
And the cock couldn't crow, and the bull couldn't low, and the dog couldn't bark."

It appears that Mr. Thayer has a great love for Firdusi and Hafiz, but he allows no predilections to narrow his range. "The Last Hunt" is a most telling ballad; and it is preceded by a lovely little poem, which it is a pain to leave unquoted.

Madonna and Other Poems. By Harrison S. Morris. (Dent.) We have not kept the worst wine to the last, for Madonna and Other Poems has given us more delight than the three other volumes put together. It is not a little curious that three out of the four poets treated of in this article live under the Stars and Stripes. The common accusation against America is that it is given over too absorbingly to the cult of the dollar; but the average Englishman is as anxious for the guinea and as intolerant of poetry as the average American can be. The Muse, however, is not likely to lose her influence because her waterfalls are tamed in the service of a factory or her peaks utilised for the advancement of some Pill-King. She discovered America before Columbus was born; and in its cities, as in its wilds, she will be a radiant wanderer so long as the mighty Western earth-child is embraced by the arms of those two mightier nurses, the Atlantic and the Pacific. And she has blessed the lips of many a singer. As her old lovers die she becomes aware of vocal striplings, children of the plain, of the hill, of the blossoming New England orchards. The men who have won repute must make room for a companion. Mr. Harrison S. Morris, by lyric right, deserves a high place. If there were not evidences of American scenery scattered through his melodious pages, we should feel it hard to believe that he was not reared in some English solitude given up to wood and fountain. His sympathies are Arcadian: he loves that healthy convention of piping shepherds; his imagination runs riot among the dreams that long ago believed that every rustle of the thicket could be translated into a Dryad. In a word, he belongs not to the new world but to the old, and his coming from America is something of a prodigy. His book is too long by sixty pages at least, for the last two sections contain little that is of value. The sonnets are respectable, without being remarkable; the verses collected under the title of "Trivia" are of no importance. These negations may be thought to be signals of unhesitating affirmatives with regard to the earlier portions of this book; so we hasten to warn our readers that they must not expect more than three or four poems that are perfect. Mannerisms, not a few forced rhymes, imperfect scansion, are blots too easily visible; but the beauties are not to be reckoned by twenties; and there is so much that actually thrills us that we heartily advise our readers to become possessed of a book that is likely to be followed by finer work.

NORMAN GALE.

NOTES AND NEWS.

THE Clarendon Press will publish immediately the long-expected edition of the Republic of Plato, by the late Prof. Jowett and Prof. Lewis Campbell. It will be in three volumes, containing respectively the Greek text, essays, and notes.

MR. WILLIAM HEINEMANN will publish early next month Mr. Henry Savage-Landor's book on Corea: its Customs and People, the result of a prolonged stay in the country. The book will be illustrated with original sketches taken by the author, and the Queen has graciously signified her acceptance of the dedication.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & Co. announce, as in the press, The Life and Times of Cardinal Wiseman, in two volumes, by Mr. Wilfrid Ward.

MR. JOHN RAE, author of several works on economical questions of the day, has written a new biography of Adam Smith, which will be published shortly by Messrs. Macmillan & Co.

MR. JOHN MURRAY announces The Evil Eye: an Account of this Ancient and Widespread Superstition, by Mr. Frederick Thomas Elworthy, with numerous illustrations.

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS will publish next week, in the "Heroes of the Nations" series, Abraham Lincoln and the Downfall of American Slavery, by Mr. Noah Brooks; and also Miss Hurd: an Enigma, by Miss A. K. Green, author of "The Leavenworth Case."

THE writings of James Thomson ("B. V.") have now been out of print for some time, owing to a fire at the printer's, which destroyed the stock of The City of Dreadful Night and his other volumes of poems. A new and complete edition of his Poetical Works is now about to be issued, including a considerable number of pieces hitherto unprinted and uncollected. It will be edited by Mr. Bertram Dobell, who will also contribute a memoir of the author. Readers of the ACADEMY will remember that it was in its pages that attention was first drawn to that remarkable poem, "The City of Dreadful Night," when its author was as yet unknown. The book will be in two volumes, and will be published by Messrs. Reeves & Turner.

MR. ELKIN MATHEWS has almost ready for publication the new edition of Mr. Frederick Wedmore's Renunciations (with a portrait by Shannon) and Pastorals of France. These, with English Episodes—now in a second edition—will complete the uniform issue of Mr.

Wedmore's short stories. Mr. Elkin Mathews will likewise immediately publish the long-expected Carols and Songs of Mr. Selwyn Image, the well-known decorative artist. The publication of Mr. Lionel Johnson's Poems will take place early in the new year.

MR. JOHN LANE will publish in December Ballads in Prose, by a new writer, Miss Nora Hopper. The spirit of the book is Celtic.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHN & Co., in conjunction with the Open Court Publishing Co. of Chicago, will publish at once a new book by Dr. Paul Carus, entitled The Gospel of Buddha. It is a simple exposition, in the words of the originals, of the life and doctrines of Gautama as they bear on the religious thought of the present time, and is said to have received the approval of several orthodox Buddhists. It is to be translated into Japanese by the ecclesiastical head of the Zen sect.

LUCAS MALET has just completed her new novel, the serial rights of which, both here and in America, have been acquired by Messrs. Methuen, who will also publish the novel which succeeds this, and which is already partly written.

MR. GILBERT PARKER's new romance, The Trail of the Sword, will not be published till the New Year; and it will then appear in a single volume.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. announce two new volumes about birds—Summer Studies of Birds and Books, by Mr. William Warde Fowler, author of that delightful and scholarly book, A Year with the Birds; and Structure and Life of Birds, by Mr. F. W. Headley, assistant master at Haileybury College. In this connexion, we may also mention that Messrs. Longmans & Co. have in the press Bird Notes, by the late Jane Mary Hayward, with illustrations by Mr. G. E. Lodge. The book is described as containing accurate accounts, written from time to time during many years, of the small incidents of bird-life that passed before the eyes of one qualified by artistic training and inherited love of birds to watch narrowly, and understand sympathetically, what was happening.

MESSRS. DIGBY, LONG, & Co. will publish immediately two new novels, each in a single volume: A Life for a Love, by Mrs. L. T. Meade; and The Other Bond, by Dora Russell.

MESSRS. DIGBY, LONG, & Co. also have in the press a new novel by Miss Arabella Kenealy, M.D., entitled Some Men are Such Gentlemen.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN will publish next week a work by Mr. A. Wallace, entitled Popular Sayings Dissected. The author has endeavoured to treat the subject philologically, and, at the same time, to avoid the ascription of history to mere alliterative phrases. He has furnished the work with a copious index.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK announces Prior Rahere's Rose, a narrative of the founding of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, with a supplementary account of the recent restoration of the Church of St. Bartholomew the Great.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON have just issued the fourth edition, completing twenty thousand copies, of Prof. Drummond's Lowell Lectures on The Ascent of Man.

THE curious account of the blood-stains on the "Holy Coat of Argenteuil," which appears in the second number of The New Science Review, was translated from the French of M. Emile Gautier, by Mr. Edward Legge.

AT a joint meeting of the Folk-lore and the Irish Literary Societies, to be held on Wednesday next at 8 p.m., at the Caledonian Hotel, Adelphi-terrace, Mr. Alfred Nutt will read a paper on "The Oldest Irish Conceptions of the Other World."

WITH reference to a note in the ACADEMY of last week on "The Man in the Iron Mask," Prof. Paul Fredericq writes to us from Ghent that, in the current number of the Revue Historique, M. Fr. Funck-Brentano has almost exhausted the subject, in an article entitled "L'Homme au masque de velours, dit le Masque du Fer."

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

MESSRS. A. D. INNES & Co. announce an illustrated Church magazine, to begin with the new year, named the Minster; at the same time the Newberry House Magazine will be withdrawn. It is intended that the new magazine shall be interesting and popular, but also treat the graver questions of the day which appeal more directly to Churchmen in a weighty and effective manner. The contributors to the opening number will include the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Dean of St. Paul's, the Headmaster of Harrow, Wilfred Cripps, Sir Benjamin Baker, Corney Grain, George Gissing, George Spottiswoode, Sir Edwin Arnold, George Saintsbury, Linley Sambourne, James Payn.

WE understand that the Antiquary is to make a new departure with the January number for 1895. A greater variety of subjects will be introduced; the magazine will be more fully illustrated than hitherto; and the paper on which it will be printed will be of a finer quality, in order to do justice to the illustrations. At the same time, the price is to be reduced from one shilling to sixpence.

LORD SALISBURY will contribute to the forthcoming number of the National Review an article dealing with the position of the House of Lords and the agitation recently fomented against it.

THE December number of the Fortnightly Review—the first under the new editorship—will contain two estimates of Lord Rosebery from the French and from the German point of view, written respectively by M. Augustin Filon, author of Profilis Anglais, and Prof. Delbrück, editor of the Preussischen Jahrbücher; a critical appreciation of Mr. R. L. Stevenson; a paper on "A True University for London" by Mr. Montague Crackenthorpe; and the continuation of Sir Evelyn Wood's "Reminiscences of the Crimea."

THE December number of Blackwood's Magazine will contain "Reminiscences of the late J. A. Froude," by "Shirley" (Mr. John Skelton), including extracts from a large number of Froude's letters, which give unreserved expression to his opinions about contemporaries, literary and political. The same number will also contain a letter from Horace in the Elysian Fields, with reference to a recent translation of the Odes.

DR. KARL BLIND will have articles in both the Contemporary and the New Review for December. In the former, he protests against the French claim to a protectorate over Madagascar; in the latter, he brings forward fresh evidence from Shetland folk-lore regarding the old Teutonic worship of Odin.

THE December number of the Quiver will contain the first instalment of a new story by the Rev. P. B. Power; an article on "The Children of Hunger," with illustrations photographed from the life; and "Chinese Pagodas," by a resident missionary.

THE Quiver annual, to be published next week, is entitled "Chinese Arrows." It will contain a complete one-volume story by May E. Shepherd, and a New Year's address by the Rev. Gordon Calthrop.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE University of Cambridge has conferred the complete degree of M.A., honoris causa, upon Dr. Rieu, the newly appointed professor of Arabic.

WHILE Cambridge has only just appointed a syndicate to consider the question of post-graduate study, at Oxford a definite scheme has been framed, in a statute to be promulgated in Congregation next Tuesday. It is proposed to create the two degrees of Bachelor of Letters and Bachelor of Science, to be conferred upon those only who have attained a high standard of merit in some approved course of study or research. Candidates must be twenty-one years of age, but the only other requirement demanded is that they shall give "evidence of having received a good general education." If not already members of the university, they must matriculate in the ordinary way; and they must keep twelve terms (i.e., three years) by residence, subject to the proviso that a previous course of two years at an affiliated college may be counted as equal to four terms. There is also a further proviso that the privileges of an affiliated college may for this purpose be extended to any other university or college. Certificates for a degree are to be granted by a special body of delegates, either after examination or on the evidence of a dissertation or report of work done. The degree of M.A. is to be open to the research graduates on the same conditions as to a B.A., subject to the proviso that the new degrees will not be merged in the M.A., as the B.A. now is. The total fees to be paid are ten guineas.

DR. J. F. BRIDGE delivered a public lecture in the Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford, on Wednesday of this week, upon "Early English Dramatic Music, from the Miracle Plays to the Masque of Comus," with illustrations by members of the choir of Westminster Abbey.

AT the meeting of the Oxford Architectural and Historical Society, to be held next Tuesday, the secretaries will present a report of the society's work during the past year, and a brief review of recent discoveries; and Mr. J. L. Myres will exhibit some specimens of Cypriote industry.

AS Gifford Lecturer on natural theology in the university of Edinburgh, Prof. Campbell Fraser proposes to deliver five lectures before Christmas (commencing last week), and five other lectures in February and March. The subjects of the several lectures before Christmas will be:—(1) "The Problem"; (2) "Three Postulates of Existence"; (3) "Materialism or Atomism"; (4) "Immaterialism or Egoism"; (5) "Impersonation or Pantheism."

A PUBLIC lecture will be delivered by Prof. Seeley, in the theatre of King's College, London, on Wednesday next, at 7 p.m., upon "The River Thames."

FROM the twenty-first annual report of the Local Examinations and Lectures Syndicate at Cambridge we quote the following passage:

"The diminution which will be noticed in the number of courses and in the total attendance is to be attributed almost entirely to the decrease in the temporary work undertaken by the Syndicate during the preceding sessions for the technical instruction committees of various County Councils. It still appears to be too early to estimate the ultimate effect which will be produced on the Local Lectures by the technical instruction movement. Whereas in some places grants of money from the local authorities have enabled local committees to arrange more easily courses of University Local Lectures on scientific, economic, and artistic subjects, in others the cheap technical classes organised independently by the local authorities have influenced very injuriously the attendance at the Local Lectures, and in some cases caused their discontinuance."

WE have received from the Clarendon Press a little volume, which has somewhat puzzled us by its title—Oxford Honours, 1220-1894. Nor is our difficulty entirely removed by the subtitle—"An Alphabetical Register of Distinctions conferred by the University of Oxford from the Earliest Times." Considering the vast pains that must have been spent upon the work, surely it was worth while to have added a preface, giving a brief explanation of "honours" and "distinctions." Primarily, of course, "honours" mean a place in the class-lists, which practically begin with the present century; while "distinctions" would naturally be taken to mean university scholarships and prizes, the oldest of which only goes back to 1726. But, as a matter of fact, we also find mention of all university offices, including the headships of colleges and halls, and even honorary D.C.L.'s since 1869, though not honorary M.A.'s. Thus, we have John Wyclif, Master of Balliol in 1361; Oliver Cromwell, Chancellor in 1650; and Gilbert White, Proctor in 1752. Apart from the perplexity caused by the principle of compilation, we have nothing but praise to award for the careful accuracy with which the work has been done, especially for the cross-references in the case of change of names. So far as regards the accumulation of "honours" and "distinctions," the present generation has a great advantage over its predecessors. The youngest of the professors can boast no less than thirteen marks, while a B.A. has seven university scholarships to his credit. But some of the old records still remain unbeaten. No one but Linwood has even gained the Hertford, Ireland, and Craven in his freshman's year; no one but Alfred Barratt has ever obtained five firsts; while Dean Johnson and Prof. Henry Smith are the only two who have won both the Ireland and the mathematical scholarship.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

FROM MAGDALEN BRIDGE.

THE floods are out, the Cherwell's rising stream
On field and meadow lies beneath the trees,
A mirror ruffled by no winter breeze,
And all illumined by the moon's gray beam.

A row of willows breasts the centre swirl,
The beech and elm stand knee deep in the lake,
The light falls through each nude November brake
Setting its stema within a sea of pearl.

Afar, in moonlit heaps of fragile shade,
Cluster the misty groves of Headington.
Beneath the hill, one hearth its torch dips down,
A ruddy streak in silver-flooded glade.

By Magdalen's tower gray lines of shrub and tree
Mark out the path still kept for Addison,
And his pale ghost may walk dry-shod thereon,
As on a pier that stretches out to sea.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"THE RAIDERS."

Penicuk: Nov. 17, 1894.

I am more than delighted that Mr. William Wallace disassociates himself from the charge which I understood him to have repeated in the ACADEMY. I heartily apologise to him for my misapprehension, which, however, I think he will allow was a somewhat natural one.

Then we have "X," which I understand implies an unknown quantity. I am not surprised at many X's; but I confess that I am surprised that the ACADEMY should think it worth its while to take a hand in the merry game.

Of course I have repeatedly and publicly declared that in The Raiders I endeavoured to reset the best known of Galloway traditions, as others have done and are doing. My friend Sir Herbert Maxwell wrote for Blackwood's a version of the "Murder Hole" legend simultaneously with mine in The Raiders. Neither of us knew that the other was doing it. Yet, as I think you will agree with me, we had a perfect right severally to do our best with these stories and common traditions. I only wish there were more of them to make use of.

It is, of course, perfectly absurd to suppose that I ever dreamed of concealing my indebtedness to Mr. James Nicholson's Traditional Tales of Galloway. The editor is alive, and is to-day my most kind and able helper in obtaining material on which to found my stories.

Strange as it may seem, I do not claim to have invented Galloway, or its traditional records: I only claim, as the humblest of her sons, to have written affectionately about her, that what I love so well others might come to love also.

The Traditional Tales is in nearly every house in Galloway. The living representative of Samuel Wilson is my friend. Mr. Nicholson himself is at present assisting me in obtaining material for a pendant to The Raiders—a story which may concern itself with the later "Levellers" of Galloway. As in The Raiders, I shall again be indebted to Mr. Nicholson's Traditional Tales, to Trotter's excellent Galloway Gossip (alas! that only one volume has been published), to Mactaggart's Galloway Encyclopædia, to the Castle Douglas Miscellany, to the Dumfries Magazine (I make a present of these to X. and his industrious clan). If I knew any more sources I should be glad to use them, and to stick as closely to them as I possibly could.

But as a lesson in the folly of the effete double-column dodge, it is instructive to turn to Scott's Preface to Guy Mannering itself. Here there are parallels quite as close as those which the ACADEMY has done me the honour to print. Says Scott:

"In his proper element Yawkins was equally successful. . . . The dauntless free trader instantly weighed anchor, and bore down between the luggers so close that he tossed his hat on the deck of the one and his wig on the deck of the other, hoisted a cask to her maintop to show his occupation, and bore away under an extraordinary press of canvas."

Here is it not obvious that Sir Walter has also been plagiarising from the Traditions—perhaps also from Mr. Stevenson, as witness the very suspicious use of the word "extraordinary"? A reputation like Scott's "ought not to be played with," as sayeth the moral but strictly anonymous "X."

Seriously, I hold that Scott, or Sir Herbert Maxwell, or I, or anyone else, has a perfect right to use all traditional and other material contemporary with the period which he desires to illustrate, and to use it as accurately as possible. For my part I don't know how a lugger would manoeuvre, and cannot invent it of my own inner consciousness. But I believe the chronicler in the Traditions knew much better than I. Very well. The Yawkins lugger shall manoeuvre in that way and in no other, in spite of all the X.'s in the world.

I will, in concluding, make that gentleman yet another present. In my next book, which concerns the Covenanting times, and is to run the whole year through the columns of Good Words, I believe that every scene is based accurately upon documents both printed and written, in every case contemporary. The incidents of the story actually occurred. I have told them, so far as I can, in the style and language of the period. Almost every conversation can be substantiated; and the letters quoted were actually written by the characters themselves in the flesh. By the expenditure of sixpence monthly "X." can insure himself a great deal of instructive research, and an indefinite supply of parallel columns to any journal which may think it worth its while to print them. I am only sorry that there is so little of this splendid rough popular material extant. It is pure gold to the romancer; and wherever I can lay hold of it and use it, why, I intend to "do it and do it again."

Hampstead: Nov. 20, 1894.

From information supplied by Mr. Crockett, I published an account of his work in the Bookman for April, 1894. There it was stated that his true Quellen was to be found in a volume entitled Traditionary and Historical Traditions of Galloway, published by Nicholson at Kirkcudbright about 1840.

Previously, in October, 1893, and on the authority of a statement made to me by Mr. Crockett, I had stated that The Raiders was based upon Galloway legends. Mr. Nicholson, I understand, is still alive, and engaged in collecting legendary and other material in Galloway for Mr. Crockett.

COVENANTING MIRACLES.

St. Andrews: Nov. 22, 1894.

I have not time to give Mr. Wallace complete references for the Covenanting claims to miraculous powers; that I could prove they worked miracles I did not assert. Mr. Wallace may remember the death of Rothes; other cases he will find in Blackadder, Blair, Walker, and Wodrow. If he wants chapter and verse I can supply them next week.

A. LANG.

ST. IGNATIUS AND THE NEW SYRIAC GOSPEL.

Ellesborough House, Tring: Nov. 19, 1894.

Mr. Conybeare's citations from Philo are exceedingly interesting, but they certainly require the citation from "Ignatius" to be convincing. Is this citation trustworthy? Ever since the appearance of Bishop Lightfoot's magnificent work, it has seemed to me that the phrase τὰς παρθένους τὰς λεγομένας χήρας was more than suspicious. Most conservative critics held, like Hefele, that they were virgins who had taken brevet rank as "widows"; according to Lightfoot, they were widows who had taken brevet rank as "virgins." Now as late as Tertullian's Montanist days (De Virg. Val. 9) it was promotion for a virgin to take brevet rank as "widow": in the eyes of a rigorist, it was a scandal for such promotion to be given at the early age of twenty; logically, it ought not to have been given at all. In the age whose usage is attested with various degrees of certainty in the Pastoral Letters, the Clementine Homilies, and the Diataga, "widows" had a dignity of their own, and had no need to borrow the dignity of virgins. The heathen (De Morte Peregrini, 12) knew they had a sort of official status in the community, and that they were elderly, like those whom Timothy is directed to enrol. Are the widows who attain a second virginity according to St. Clement old? Does not διὰ σωφροσύνης point to the class which Timothy is to reject? Tertullian certainly speaks of the young Deo speciosae, Deo sunt puellae—they have youth and beauty to consecrate. Can we argue from them to the "widows" under the care of Polycarp, who were certainly elderly like those under the care of Timothy? Again, if widows took brevet rank as "virgins," the latter must have been officially recognised; but Ad. Pol. v. excludes such recognition for either sex: no one but the bishop is to know of a vow of continence; men and women ought to marry with his approval.

If there is anything in these arguments, two alternatives are open: the reading of our MSS. is a third century gloss on τὰς χήρας, which displaced the original; or the shorter Greek text (the oldest we have) is itself an expansion of the work of Ignatius himself or of a nearly contemporary panegyrist (I suspect his appetite for publicity in all the passages about solemn deputations to the Church of Antioch, which were the very thing to revive persecution). In that case, the writer who would have expected a bishop of his own day to salute "virgins," remembered that a bishop of Trajan's day was likely to salute "widows," and combined the two as a sub-apostolic writer hardly could.

As to the general question, is Mr. Conybeare's suggestion that Matt. i. 19, 20 are an interpolation compatible with the fresh beginning (which in itself need not imply a fresh document) in v. 17? If they are genuine, cannot writers of our First Gospel have believed that St. Joseph was the father of the Son of David, as David was the father of Solomon? The new Syriac text does strengthen the probability that those who drew up the genealogies incorporated in the First and Third Gospels, still believed what almost everybody believed at Nazareth when the Lord was upon earth. If there was no mystery, why does each Evangelist give one parent's side of the story? As Mr. Badham observes, we cannot read the narrative of the Third Gospel into the First; but perhaps there is a veiled reference to the subject-matter of Matt. i. 19, 20 in Luke i. 30. Speaking for myself, it is no intellectual relief to suppose that the neighbours at Nazareth knew nothing because there was nothing (for them) to know. As for the theory which Mr. Badham attributes to both Evangelists, that St. Joseph became a father without knowing it, Venturino's view, still to be found in Strauss, seems to me just as probable and just as edifying.

G. A. SIMCOX.

THE "LOOVER" OF A HALL: ITS ETYMOLOGY.

Oxford: Nov. 14, 1894.

Baret has the following account of this word: "A loover, or tunnell in the rooffe, or top of a great hall, to avoid smoke: fumarium, spiramentum." From the days of Nares, and probably earlier, the word has been connected with the French combination l'ouvert. The word loover occurs in "Piers the Plowman" (C. Text, xxi. 288), and is mentioned in Prof. Skeat's Glossarial Index, in which place we are told that "the derivation is certainly [the italics are Prof. Skeat's] from the French l'ouvert." For proof we are referred to Prof. Skeat's article on the word in his Dictionary. It appears to me that there are grave difficulties in the way of this equation of loover (the ordinary Middle English form) with the French l'ouvert (i.e., the open), difficulties which are not met in Prof. Skeat's article.

We are told that loovere ("fumarium") is identical with a French louvert—i.e., l'ouvert. The first difficulty is that there is no French word ouvert (or lowert) having the technical meaning of a "loover," or opening in the roof, or even meaning an "opening" in general; ouvert simply means "open," loouvert could only mean "the open"; "the opening," on the other hand, would have been expressed by l'ouverture. But let us suppose that there was once a French combination loouvert, which had the sense of the English "loover."

How would this help us? How could a French loouvert become loover in Middle English? How can the loss of the final t be accounted for? The word loovere is an exceedingly common word in Middle and Tudor English. It is very strange that no form preserving the French final t can be produced from any English text. As the form loouvert cannot be cited as an English word, is it not extremely probable that the form with t never existed, and that, therefore, loovere represents without diminution the original French form? Surely a French loouvert must have become lovert in M.E., and would not lose its t eventually; Fr. ouvert has become "overt," couvert "covert," and part "part." For the above reasons I think it is quite impossible that our "loover" can be identical with French loouvert.

Is it possible to propose an etymology of "loover" in the place of the one which identifies it with louvert? I think we have a clue to the derivation of the word. It is surely a significant fact that in mediaeval Glosses the word "louere" is very commonly rendered by the Latin word lodium. This Med. Lat. lodium renders "louere" in the Promptorium, in the Catholicon Anglicum, in the Ortus (the Pynson edition), and three times in the Wright-Wülker Vocabularies (see Index). This word lodium is not to be found in Ducange. The omission would make it probable that the Med. Lat. lodium is not of French or Latin origin. What can be the derivation of lodium? I believe that the word is of Scandinavian origin, and that it is a derivative from Icelandic hlöð a hearth, chimney-place; cp. lodium "fumarium." Middle English louere would represent an Anglo-Norman loëre*=Med. Lat. lodarium*, a derivative of the same Icelandic hlöð. For the intercalated v, taking the place of a vanished dental, we may compare O.E. pouvoir (mod. pouvoir) for pooir, Romanic podère (potère). I may also refer to the Scottish word in Jamieson: "Lower, the lure of a hawk"; cp. the French leurre. Here the v is intercalated, to fill up the hiatus caused by the vanishing of an intervocal d or th; cp. O.H.G. lōthra-, Germ. Luder; see Kluge's Etym. Dict. (s.v.). In this derivation there do not appear to be difficulties on the score either of phonetics or of sense-development. The etymology may have been suggested before, but if so, it has not come before my notice.

MYTHS OF COSMOGONY BY DR. POLITES.

London: Nov. 17, 1894.

In the Δημιουργικὴ Κοσμογονικὴ Μύθος, which, simultaneously with its publication in Athens, has just reached me, Dr. Polites contributes another of his exhaustive studies to the aggregate of folk-lore literature. The present work, as its title shows, is not confined to the myths of his own country, either past or present, but is devoted to the comparative methods of treatment; and the result is a most comprehensive survey of kindred beliefs upon the one particular myth that he has chosen to elucidate in countries far separated from each other in both space and time. The myth in question is—how the earth and the heavens, supposed to have been originally one solid block, became separated and disjoined, hereafter to keep each its own place. The long list of authorities and notes testifies to the care and arduous study with which Dr. Polites has approached his task. It may be sufficient to indicate the range of authors quoted, which reaches from Hesiod to Maspero and Andrew Lang. As these works are well known to the Folk-lore Society, and are all accessible to the English reader, it is needless to recapitulate them or the facts which they record.

The concluding chapter, however, narrates some myths of Modern Greece which may be as new to readers of the ACADEMY as they are to me. There is a saying in some parts—for I think a mistake is often made by taking all sayings to be beliefs—that when God made man, the devil, envious of His power, and not willing to be outdone, tried his hand in making animals, but that the Creator, to punish his audacity, made it impossible for him to give life. The following, which is a good example, will suffice: "They say in Akarnania that when God made man the devil made the ass; but not being able to make it move, and being therefore in despair, he called upon Christ to give it life. 'Rise up, O Ass,' said Christ, 'that Poverty may live.'"

ELIZABETH M. EDMONDS

"DOMUS EXILIS PLUTONIA."

Trinity College, Dublin: Nov. 19, 1891.

Strangely enough, the current Saturday Review and Spectator both choose the same phrase in Mr. Gladstone's translation of the Odes of Horace, the one for condemnation, the other for eulogy. The phrase is domus exilis Plutonia (Carm. i. 4, 17), which is rendered "Pluto's cribbing cell." Now surely the Saturday Review is right, and Mr. Gladstone's version is indefensible. Exilis is not exigua. It refers to what is "empty, unsubstantial." Thus, a legion far below its real strength is called exilis, "a paper legion," by Cicero. Domus is "household, family"; and the expression refers to the "shadowy inmates" of "the vasty hall of death," the νεκρῶν ἀνεμνὰ κάπηνα of Homer, the levem turbam of Carm. i. 10, 18. Exilis might possibly (though not probably) mean "poorly-provided," as opposed to the luxurious home which Sestius was destined to leave; but it could not mean "cribbing," which, moreover, is an ungraceful modification of a well-known Shaksperian expression.

Another translation praised by the Spectator, that of terrarum dominos in the first Ode, though vigorous in expression, almost certainly misrepresents the meaning.

"THE BEST PLAYS OF BEN JONSON."

University College, Aberystwith: Nov. 17, 1894.

As my name has been introduced in connexion with the second volume of the "Best Plays of Ben Jonson," announced in last week's ACADEMY, I should be glad to be allowed to state definitely that I have no share in it, having upon the appearance of the first volume declined any further connexion with the series.

I must in particular disclaim responsibility for the limitation—which I infer from your notice—to two volumes, and the omission of "Volpone," "Epicoene," and "The Alchemist," which were to have formed the third. For this limitation there are no doubt good reasons; but a selection which excludes these masterpieces ought not surely to be entitled "The Best Plays of Ben Jonson."

C. H. HERFORD.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

- SUNDAY, Nov. 25, 4 p.m. Sunday Lecture: "Madame d'Epinois and her Circle," by Mrs. Frederika Macdonald.
7.30 p.m. Ethical: "Rights and Duties," by Mr. J. S. Mackenzie.
- MONDAY, Nov. 26, 5 p.m. London Institution: "The Newtonian Constant of Gravitation; or, Weighing the Earth," by Prof. C. V. Boys.
8 p.m. Royal Academy: "Selected Palettes," by Prof. A. H. Church.
8.30 p.m. Geographical: "A Journey to Taflet, Morocco," by Mr. Walter B. Harris.
- TUESDAY, Nov. 27, 4.30 p.m. Colonial Institute: "The North-West District of British Guiana," by Mr. G. C. Dixon.
8 p.m. Civil Engineers: Discussion, "The Machinery of War-Ships," by Mr. Albert J. Durston.
- WEDNESDAY, Nov. 28, 8 p.m. Irish Literary Society: "The Oldest Irish Conceptions of the Other World," by Mr. Alfred Nutt.
8 p.m. Society of Arts: "Experiments in Aeronautics," by Mr. Hiram Maxim.
- THURSDAY, Nov. 29, 7 p.m. London Institution: "Contemporary Music," by Sir Joseph Barnby.
8 p.m. Royal Academy: "Vehicles and Varnishes," by Prof. A. H. Church.
8 p.m. Chemical: "Latent Heats of Fusion," by Mr. Holland Crompton; "The Fundamental Laws of Thermo-Chemistry," by Mr. W. Sutherland; "Preparation of Adipic Acid," by Dr. W. H. Ince; "Some Derivatives of Adipic Acid," by Dr. W. H. Ince.
8.30 p.m. Antiquaries.
- FRIDAY, Nov. 30, 8 p.m. Civil Engineers: Students' Meeting, "Sub-aqueous Excavation at Newry," by Mr. C. H. Olley.

SCIENCE.

Beginnings of Writing in Central and Eastern Asia. By Terrien de Lacouperie. (David Nutt.)

THE lamented death on October 11 of the distinguished Orientalist, the final results of whose labours are recorded in this volume, lends to it a melancholy interest. His name is a guarantee that it is erudite and laborious, crowded with new facts, as well as with novel interpretations of old facts. Like all his previous works, it is fertile in suggestion and in ingenious hypothesis, but disjointed and inconclusive, the author never having possessed that faculty of lucid and orderly exposition which would have enabled him to obtain the recognition due to his immense acquirements and his rare and recondite erudition. He advances original and startling theories, plausible in appearance, but of which any strict scientific demonstration continually eludes the student's grasp. Just as we seem to be approaching the point on which the whole argument hinges, we are told that the proof of some statement which, if proved, would be conclusive evidence, is about to appear in a treatise which has not yet been published, or we are referred to a paper in some inaccessible volume of Transactions or Proceedings, which, when at last hunted up, does not advance the argument, but merely repeats, in other words, the statement which has been made in the text.

This book has even less organic structure than usual, being made up of papers, mostly unpublished, which have been put in type at intervals during the last ten years. The unavoidable result is lack of continuity: a subject is taken up and partially discussed, re-discussed in subsequent chapters, the statements being supplemented in a penultimate chapter, entitled "Some More Facts," and qualified or emended in a bundle of "Additions and Emendations," which forms a final chapter. Hence the book, though crammed with valuable matter, which would have been a fortune to almost any other writer, is chaotic in form and desultory in structure.

Of the many subjects treated or touched upon, the more notable are the derivation of the Tibetan alphabet from the Nagari, of the Japanese syllabary from the Chinese, and the evolution of the Mongolian and Manchu scripts from the Syriac alphabet, as established by the inscription of the Nestorian missionaries at Si-ngan-fu in China, of which a full account is given. On these matters Dr. Terrien fortunately has no new theories to announce, but merely follows the opinions generally entertained by scholars. He also devotes several pages to the singular runiform writing of the inscriptions recently discovered in Siberia, which belong, he considers, to about the eighth century A.D., noting that the similar writing on the silver cups from Perm establishes a geographical connexion with Runic lands, and finally coming to the judicious conclusion that "all questions of the origin of this writing remain at present matters of conjecture" (p. 164). There is also a discussion as to the nature and origin of the mysterious inscriptions brought from Easter Island. This script, Dr. Terrien believes, must belong to the South Indian family of alphabets, which extended to Java and Celebes. He tells us that he now publishes this "palaeographical discovery" for the use of others, characteristically adding that his hands are so full that he has no time to give the proof. The present writer may add, in support of this statement, that several years ago he had himself, on independent grounds, arrived at a similar conclusion.

Dr. Terrien's well-known views as to the Bak tribes, and the Babylonian origin of the Chinese script and civilisation, startling as they were thought when first propounded more than ten years ago, have now won their way to a sort of provisional recognition as a tenable working hypothesis. In the present work these views are repeatedly stated and restated, but without much fresh light being thrown on the subject, although at one moment the author appears to be coming to a point in the argument which would be really decisive: namely, the resemblance between the proto-Chinese and the ancient Babylonian characters, as to which Dr. Terrien roundly asserts (p. 35) that "their identity is indisputable." For a comparison of the two we are referred "to plate iv. of the present work," on eagerly searching for which we discover, as might almost have been expected, that only three plates are given. In default of this demonstration, we do not practically get further than Dr. Terrien's belief in the identity of the characters, and the shadowy evidence of the Chinese historians to which he appeals. As to the historical value of these records, the present writer is not qualified to form an opinion; and he will therefore confine himself to incidental admissions made by Dr. Terrien, who speaks of certain vague Chinese traditions, "enveloped in a mist of fiction, that their writing comes from the West," these traditions being entangled, he says, with secondary myths of later growth, under the influence of foreign ideas. But when such a precise date as about 2282 B.C. is put forward as the time when the Babylonian writing was transmitted to China, it can only be said that, on his own showing, the Chinese records are not sufficiently trustworthy to bear such a burden. He tells us of the "five great bibliothecal catastrophes in which the greater part of the historical literature of China has been destroyed" (p. 114), while the traditions have been amended and completed in a way that has impaired their credibility, numerous legends having been engendered by the manner in which uncritical Chinese compilers have embellished their records (p. 23).

These considerations affect the evidence not only as to the Babylonian origin of the Chinese writing, but as to another theory even more revolutionary. They make it difficult to regard as historical the Chinese accounts of Indian embassies and expeditions to China about 1000 B.C., or of an Indian dynasty established in China in the fourth century B.C., which are adduced by Dr. Terrien in support of the most important thesis in the book—an attempt to establish the evolution of the Maurya or proto-Indian alphabet of the Asoka inscriptions from the Chinese script: a theory which is opposed to the general belief of scholars, that the source of the Indian writing was some early type of the Semitic alphabet, most probably the Hiyaritic of Southern Arabia. Conscious of the weakness of the appeal to Chinese tradition, Dr. Terrien affirms that "the solution of the question is given by palaeography," as shown by the comparative table of the Asoka and Chinese characters "given on plate vi." This all-important plate being, like the other, absent from the book, we have the characteristic statement that "all this requires to be explained with more length and precision in a special paper" (p. 119). We are also referred to a paper read before the Royal Asiatic Society, which has never been published, though a brief abstract is printed in the Annual Report for 1881, from which we learn that Dr. Terrien "pointed out that historical facts as well as traditions clearly show that relations did exist between India and China as early as the third century B.C.," and laid before the Society a series of tables, proving, in his judgment, that the Indo-Pali, Korean, Japanese, Lampong, Rejanj, Batak, and Lolo writing "are, really, all offshoots from an older system of writing, consisting, on the borders of China, of a certain number of Chinese characters used phonetically for commercial purposes. The Indo-Pali writing has, he argued, been systematised in India from this older form of writing." He has now wisely surrendered most of these rash conclusions. With other scholars, he now admits that the Korean alphabet was founded on "a Tibeto-Indian base" by Buddhist teachers (p. 148), and also accepts the general opinion that the Batak "is a degraded type of Indian descent, through the Old Kawi of Java" (p. 93); and if this is admitted in the case of the Batak, it must also be admitted for the Rejanj, Lampong, and other Malayan alphabets. As to the Japanese syllabaries he surrenders his former position, and adopts the usual opinion that they were derived from the Chinese about the ninth or tenth century A.D.

But he still maintains the theory of the Chinese origin of the Indian alphabets, referring for proof to the plate which has been omitted (pl. vi.), and to a paper on the Lolo writing published in vol. xiv. of the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, in which he claims to have shown that the characters on the Harapa seal, supposed to be a very ancient prototype of the Asoka alphabet, "are the same writing as that now possessed by the Lolos." If such identity existed it would prove nothing, as it is futile to compare the forms of characters differing in date by two or three thousand years. Out of the many hundred Lolo characters, Dr. Terrien selects five for comparison with the five characters on the Harapa seal. The forms agree, but he does not claim that there is any agreement in their phonetic values. On the very doubtful hypothesis that the Harapa characters were the prototypes of the Indian letters, General Cunningham made a guess at their phonetic values; but in no single case do the phonetic values assigned to the Harapa characters agree with the phonetic values attributed by Dr. Terrien to the Lolo characters with which he identifies them. The Harapa l is of the same form as the Lolo n, while the Harapa characters supposed to represent m, y, and ch do not resemble the Lolo characters supposed to represent the same sounds. It is on such visionary grounds that Dr. Terrien claims to have established the Chinese parentage of the Indian script.

Dr. Terrien has put forward many startling theories; but his reasoning is usually so illusive, and his premises so difficult to test, that it is impossible to say precisely what it is he means, and whether he has established his case or not. It has, therefore, seemed worth while to examine in detail this instance of an alleged discovery, as it happens to be possible to ascertain the actual amount of evidence which he considered sufficiently conclusive to justify the claim of having discovered an entirely new solution of a problem generally considered to be settled.

But putting aside his theories, many of which he has himself surrendered, his books will long remain a mine of valuable information, and a striking memorial of a laborious and unrewarded life of assiduous and single-minded toil.

OBITUARY.

COL. GARRICK MALLERY.

WE regret to hear of the sudden death of one of the foremost American ethnologists, Colonel Mallery, which took place on October 24, in the sixty-fourth year of his age.

Garrick Mallery was born in 1831 in Pennsylvania, being descended on both sides from what are known as "revolutionary families." He graduated at Yale in 1850, and practised as a lawyer until the Civil War drew him into the ranks as a volunteer from his native State. On the restoration of peace he retired with the brevet of lieutenant-colonel, and was placed in charge of the Signal Service Bureau. In 1876 he was appointed to a post in the Bureau of Ethnology, which he held until his death. The special subjects to which he devoted himself were the sign-language and the pictographs of the North American Indians. Both of these he studied exhaustively, by personal intercourse with the aborigines, and also through the large collections that have been formed at Washington. His methods were eminently scientific; for he followed the comparative method, and used his materials to illustrate the prehistoric origins of language and of writing. His results are to be found in the annual reports of the Bureau of Ethnology, which are circulated widely by the Smithsonian Institution.

The tenth of these reports—that for 1888-89, which has only just been received in his country—is almost entirely devoted to a paper by Col. Mallery, entitled "Picture-Writing of the American Indians." Some idea of its character may be inferred from the statement that it occupies 822 pages, and is illustrated with 1290 figures, many of them coloured plates. Would that the Government of British India could attract such men into its service, and publish their researches on an equally sumptuous scale!

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE current number of the Journal of Philology (Macmillans) is not so much devoted, as has been usual lately, to the examination of MSS. It begins, however, with two contributions from Prof. Robinson Ellis, in which he records the notable variants of the Culex in the Escorial MS., and of the Aetna in the Stabulensian Fragment, adding, in the latter case, suggestions of interpretation. In a third paper, he returns to Herodas, and again argues against the received view that assigns the poet to the third century. In particular, he now throws out the opinion that he may have lived between 200 and 100 B.C., finding a possible reference in ii. 71, 73, to Philip, son of Demetrios, King of Macedonia (220-179 B.C.). With regard to Maro, he suggests that the name may be intended to localise the poem by an allusion to one of the demes of Alexandria. He also makes several textual emendations. Mr. E. G. Hardy argues, against Mommsen, that Augustus did not enrol eight new legions at the crisis of the Pannonian revolt (6-9 A.D.). Mr. W. E. Heitland discusses afresh the entire subject of the topography of the Sicilian expedition, as described by Thucydides, treating Diodorus as an altogether untrustworthy authority. Mr. Colin E. Campbell proposes a new interpretation of the simile in cxlviii. of the Phaëdo, as against the view taken by Mr. Archer-Hind. Mr. F. W. Thomas examines, with statistical apparatus, the use of $\eta\eta$ and $\delta\delta$ in Homer. And, finally, Mr. Gerald H. Rendall propounds a large number of textual emendations in the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius. We may take this opportunity of mentioning that the paper on Suetonius' Life of Lucretius, of which an abstract appeared in the ACADEMY of September 29, has been unavoidably postponed to the next number of the Journal of Philology.

THE two last numbers of the Classical Review (David Nutt) do not contain much of special interest. For October, Prof. Henry Sidgwick expands the passage of the "Constitution of Athens," dealing with the period from Solon's year of office to the year of the ten archons (594-580 B.C.), by a series of ingenious inferences and conjectures; Prof. Constantiniades, of Athens, prints a collation of the Athos MS. of the Homeric Hymns; J. S. discusses the explanations that have been given of the phrase operae est, and suggests that the true meaning is "it is a willing service, a pleasant task." Among reviews, we may mention Ganzemüller's "Ciris," by Prof. Ellis; Schlee's "Scholia Terentiana"; Hübner's "Monumenta Linguae Ibericae," by Prof. R. S. Conway, who reproduces a table of the alphabets used in Further and Hither Spain; Bolderman's "Studia Lucianea"; and Heberdey's dissertation on Pausanias. Such elaborate reviews of foreign books on classical subjects are to be found in no other English periodical.

FOR November, Mr. A. Bernard Cook examines some descriptive Greek names for animals, suggesting that they may have had their origin in the widespread superstition which induces people to avoid offending an animal by using its actual name; Prof. J. B. Mayor continues his critical notes on the "Stromateis" of Clement of Alexandria, and Mr. Herbert Richards concludes his on the "Republic" of Plato; Archdeacon Cheetham defends Schürer's views as to the meaning of St. Paul's Galatia, against Prof. W. M. Ramsay. The most important reviews are:—Delbrück's "Comparative Syntax," by D. B. Monro; Erhardt's treatise on the Homeric question, by Dr. Walter Leaf; and Anrich's "Relation of Christianity to the Ancient Mysteries." Finally, we must not omit mention of the obituary notice of Dr. Greenhill, by W. W.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

CARLYLE SOCIETY.—(Monday, Nov. 5.)

DR. OSWALD, president, delivered an address in memory of the late Dr. John Nichol, formerly professor of English Literature at Glasgow University, who had for some years been one of the most active members of the society. After recapitulating the chief facts of his life, the speaker proceeded: "To us he gave 'Carlyle and Glasgow: Carlyle's Attitude to Politics and Religion,' on May 4, 1891; 'Plato and Carlyle,' on February 1, 1892; and 'Transition from Plato to Carlyle,' on April 10, 1893. Who that heard these lectures, as brilliant as they were solid, does not recollect them with a thrill of pleasure at the great intellectual treat he gave us. And so, when he took part in any discussion arising out of a paper read by another member, he always contributed wit and wisdom to our deliberations, while he also knew how to keep back with a charming modesty on questions which lay in fields that even his wide sphere of knowledge had perhaps less fully embraced. . . . His weighty thought was married to a flowing style. His was essentially a loving and lovable nature. His gravity could alternate with playfulness, and all his being, again like Carlyle's, was permeated with that savour of life—an unextinguishable humour." A resolution of sympathy with the bereaved family was then passed by the members rising in their places. —In reference to the death of Prof. Froude, the following letter, addressed by him to the society, May 10, 1882, was read:—"You are like the small company which gathered together in an 'smoking chamber' 1800 years ago to profess a belief which the world called madness. You will not grow like a mushroom, but also you will not perish like a mushroom. . . . We are so accustomed to rapid results from any principle which we adopt, that we are apt to be disappointed if the results which we desire are slow in coming. But if we are disappointed it will be because we have believed amiss. The end of all governments is that each individual man shall know the truth and practise it. This already (if Carlyle has seen the truth) we can each (we who trust in him) do for ourselves, and as far as we are concerned the result is obtained. I believe that representative Party Government is near its end, and that very serious things will follow. But what then? We can go quietly on upon our own road, and be able when called on to give a fair account of ourselves." —The meeting then turned to the further consideration of the vacation-study, "Carlyle's Chartism and Kingley's Alton Locke," introduced by Mr. R. Scarlett in a brief paper, and a lively debate ensued.

ELIZABETHAN.—(Wednesday, Nov. 7.)

FREDERICK ROGERS, Esq., in the chair.—Mrs. J. M. Strachey read a paper on "Sir Philip Sidney and the Arcadia." The name of Sir Philip Sidney was sounded so loudly on the contemporary trumpet of fame, that this single blast has reverberated through succeeding generations, and has not ceased to echo in our own. Few who are not professed students are really acquainted with his writings: he is not even one of those authors whom it is a matter of good-breeding to assume that every well-educated person has read; and yet his name and reputation are among the commonplaces of English literature. After dealing with the biographical aspect of Sidney's career in so far as it was entwined with his career as a man of letters, Mrs. Strachey proceeded to consider more particularly the quality of his writing and the effect of it on English literature, which he influenced in a far greater degree than he is generally given credit for. When he began to write, the question of what form English poetry, prose, and drama should ultimately take was being eagerly debated among all lovers of letters. Their brains were seething with ideas; they were intimately acquainted with the literatures of Greece and Rome and Italy, but the tools were not yet forged which should enable Englishmen to give shape to the imaginations crowding upon them. The period was one of the stirring of some great birth not yet come to light. One poet, shortly to be hailed as master, was making experiments now in one direction, now in another; and Sidney, working by Spenser's side, was to become the second great example to succeeding writers of a novel development in the art of English writing. The Shepherd's Calendar was dedicated to him; the first three books of the Fuery Queen were published after his death in the same year as the Arcadia. We know what form Sidney desired the coming literature to take: he was in favour of exchanging the "encumbrance of rhyme" for "classical rhythm"; he considered that tragedies should be written strictly on the model of Seneca's plays; and that poems in prose were lovely and admirable things. Posterity has decided against all these theories. Sidney himself deliberately turned his back on classical experiment in the only poems of his which live. With regard to the principles of dramatic art, if Sidney's life had been prolonged to its natural close, he would have had ample proof that the dramatic genius of England was of a quality to burst the bounds of place and time, and to create new conventions to work in, and a new point of perspective from which to be viewed. The question of prose poems brought Mrs. Strachey to Sidney's principal achievement in letters: the famous, the forgotten, Arcadia. The first edition was published in 1590—four years after Sidney's death—under the title of "The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia." It contains about two-thirds of the work as we know it, all of it that had received his final revision. The remaining third was, at his death, still in the loose sheets which, as we learn from his dedication, he sent off as they were written to his sister, the Countess of Pembroke. In the second edition of 1593 these MSS., arranged by Lady Pembroke, were added to the rest of his work, though a gap still remains unfilled between the two portions. The tale relates the love of two young but renowned princes for the fair daughter of Basilius, King of Arcadia; by means of what disguises these are wooed, through what mighty combats they are protected from eager rivals; and how at length, caught in a network of cruel accidents, both lovers and beloved seem to be in a desperate extreme; from which, of course, an unexpected turn of fate delivers them, and secures the happiness of Musidorus with his Pamela, and Pyrocles with Philoclea. This main thread is intersected with innumerable episodes, and the scene crowded with a multitude of personages, the effect of which is extremely confusing, owing mainly to the inartistic manner in which the narrative is developed. But some of these episodes are admirable in themselves, and give proof of great inventive power; they provided succeeding authors with plots for many a tragedy. One of them was taken by Shakespeare for the underplot of "King Lear"—the tragic story of Gloucester and his sons. There are short poems scattered throughout the work; and at the end of each of the five books into which it is divided there is a poetical contest among the Arcadian shepherds in verses styled Eclogues by Sidney, which are mostly experiments in adapting classical metres to the English tongue. It is certain that the Arcadia was looked upon both by Sidney and his contemporaries as a poem. Meres, for instance, states: "Sir Philip Sidney writ his immortal poem, the Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia, in prose, and yet our rarest poet." According to them the term would be applied to all works of high imagination and noble aims. Sidney defined poesy as an art of imitation—a speaking picture—with this end, to teach and delight. In the Arcadia he attempted to weave for this essential substance a raiment of dainty words and harmonious cadences, where the rhythms should be different, but hardly less elaborate than those of verse. He had carefully considered the art of what he styled diction, protesting against the affectations of far-fetched and archaic terms and the abuse of ornament, declaring the end of speech to be "the uttering sweetly and properly the conceits of the mind." His own affectation is in the structure of the sentence, not in the words composing it. If he failed to make the writing of poetical prose finally acceptable, the effect of his experiment was none the less immense. Never before had the current language—the words in ordinary use—been employed with such abundance, such versatility, such distinction, with a movement so express and admirable. It is true the words are often overstrained, and still oftener placed in fantastic juxtaposition; but the net result of Sidney's Arcadia was to leave the English language as supple as a glove for the use of succeeding writers. In concluding her interesting paper Mrs. Strachey said, "If his work has been less lasting than his renown, we must remember that it was the work of a young man under thirty, standing almost alone in the field of literature. Only ten years older than Shakspeare, he was destined to go to his grave without hearing the triumphant answer even then awaiting his question, 'Why England (the mother of excellent minds) should be grown so hard a stepmother to poets.' What would have been the effect on a mind so apt and fervid of the torrent of poetry which surged in after the breaking of the dykes by Kit Marlowe's 'Tamburlaine,' it is vain to conjecture. We know only that to that glorious generation Sidney was a delight and an inspiration. We catch an echo of his phrases on the lips of the greatest among them; and we can but lament, with useless regret for ourselves and tenderness for him, that untimely death came to seal the ears of the poet of the Arcadia to the music of him who was the poet of 'Romeo and Juliet.'"—The discussion which followed was opened by Mr. Frederick Rogers and continued by Mr. Frank Payne, Mr. A. O. Hayward, Mr. R. J. Parker, Mr. W. Rickard, Mr. J. A. Jenkinson, and Mr. James Ernest Baker.

FINE ART.

Raphael's Madonnas, and other Great Pictures.

Reproduced from the Original Paintings, with a Life of Raphael and an Account of his Chief Works, by Karl Károly. (Bell.)

THE new methods of reproduction by photographic process from original pictures are likely to produce a considerable change in certain departments or side-issues of art-criticism as opposed to connoisseurship. It has now become possible to compare minutely in most points of design and composition (though not, of course, in touch or colour) the most varied works of the same or of different masters, in the most distant galleries, almost as well for some purposes as if one had the originals themselves placed side by side for collation. In earlier days, the critic who desired to get a complete conception of the entire work of a painter or a school had to carry about with him a whole portfolio of engravings, where such were procurable, and to examine these somewhat cumbrous and often inaccurate reproductions before the face of the various originals between which he proposed to institute a comparison. He also required a most retentive memory, and a sufficiently long acquaintance with the various originals to stamp them deeply upon it. Nowadays, however, it is quite possible for the student who has seen, say, the famous Giorgione in the church at Castelfranco, to compare it minutely in all save colour with the little study or copy—whichever it may be—of a single figure in the National Gallery, by means of a small photograph giving the detail of the original San Liberale. (I apply to this personage the name which he bears by common prescription, though I believe him to be really a St. George, for certain reasons into which I may at some future time more fully enter.) Persons interested in the historical study of schools, the development of a particular master's style, or the evolution of art in general, have long been familiar with this mode of comparison, which often brings out surprising and unexpected results. It is probable, therefore, that in the future many books like Mr. Károly's will be produced, to save us the trouble and expense of procuring for ourselves the individual photographs, often extremely difficult to obtain, as those interested in these matters know to their cost; and we certainly cannot have too many of such volumes. Here, within the compass of a single portable book, which may easily be taken into galleries or museums for reference and comparison, we have for the first time a complete series of Raphael's Madonnas, authentic or reputed, reproduced, not from engravings, but in every case from the originals themselves, and including not only accessible works like those in the Louvre, the Uffizi, the Pitti, the National Gallery, the Old Pinakothek, or the Hermitage, but also such far less easily seen pictures as the Duc d'Aumale's, Lord Cowper's, Prince Esterhazy's, Lord Ellesmere's, and Sir J. C. Robinson's. Mr. Károly deserves much praise and thanks for the pains he has taken in obtaining good photographs of all these widely scattered pictures—from Madrid to St. Petersburg, and from Panshauger to Vienna, Dresden, and Naples—a thing infinitely more difficult and troublesome than merely to go to the spot and look at the originals. I hope the success of this beautiful work will be such as to enable the author to follow it up with many similar and equally useful volumes.

From the critical point of view, Mr. Károly has not much that is new to offer us. He gives a short sketch of Raphael's life, in which (as elsewhere throughout) he adopts what may briefly be described as the perfectly orthodox Morellian standpoint. His account of Raphael's portraits, frescoes, and easel-works in general, other than Madonnas, such as the Sposalizio and the Transfiguration, is rapid and somewhat perfunctory, being hardly more, indeed, than what the student may find in Kugler and Layard. Nor do the notices of the individual Madonnas contain much that is novel, being confined for the most part to a brief description of the subject, together with a few critical quotations, at times amusingly contradictory, from Crowe and Cavalcaselle, Passavant, Gruyer, Morelli, Müntz, and other authorities. The reader is thus given the sum of the best opinions, and is allowed to choose for himself between the ideas and beliefs of the conflicting doctors. Indeed, it is rather the design and method of the work which is excellent in itself, than anything special or original in the mode of its execution. It forms, in short, a handy note-book of Raphael criticism, with illustrative process-engravings of the original pictures.

With regard to the main idea of presenting at one glance all Raphael's Madonnas in chronological order, with other subjects omitted, it might be objected that this volume is in one way a trifle inconsistent. It does not enable one consecutively to follow out the type of the Madonna. For its criterion of Madonnahood seems to consist in the fact that a picture contains a Virgin and Child, no matter how many other figures or incidents may go to compose it. In reality, I think, these pictures might better be reduced to four or five distinct types, each of which is worth tracing separately along its own line of chronological development. If we are going to isolate the Madonna types at all from the general stream of Raphael's development (and I see great advantage in so doing), we may as well isolate them completely and logically while we are about it.

The first and simplest type, it seems to me, is the traditional one of the Madonna and Child alone, as we get it direct from Byzantine and Giottoesque art—through the Umbrian masters—the most persistent and the most profoundly conventionalised of all Christian images. It is also the one which even Raphael was the longest in venturing largely to revolutionise. He accepted it as it came to him from Perugino and Timoteo Viti, and altered it but slowly. To this type belong the Madonna Solly, the unapproachable Gran' Duca, the two Cowper Madonnas, the Orleans, the Bridgewater, and a few less certain or less interesting examples. It is in this central group and the next that we can trace most clearly the various stages of that "earthward pilgrimage," which brought Raphael gradually down from the pure Umbrian saintliness of the Gran' Duca, with its sweet reminiscences of Timoteo Viti and Perugino, through the artistic and Florentine soulfulness of the Cowper of 1505 and the "Belle Jardinière," to the mere charming human beauty of the pretty and graceful Roman contadina, with her many-coloured kerchief, who does duty for the Virgin of Bethlehem in the Madonna della Sedia. "The most beautiful picture in the world, I am convinced," said Hawthorne of this last—a monument of his judgment. Strange that he should say so with the Gran' Duca and Botticelli's Judith on the same walls to confront him! The mass are with him, of course: it is the most popular of pictures; but in art, the verdict of the mass is seldom if ever the right one.

The second type of Raphael's Madonnas is that which embraces the Madonna and Child, with the infant St. John. This type is not, like the first, traditional; it was invented, I believe, by Florentine sculptors, partly in order to introduce St. John Baptist, the patron saint of Florence, and partly in order to secure for their work a pyramidal composition. It was afterwards adopted and adapted by the Florentine painters for the same reason. The type does not occur among Raphael's earlier quasi-Umbrian works—unless, indeed, we accept the genuineness of the Diotallevi at Berlin. The best-known and most typical examples—the Madonna al Verde at Vienna, the Cardellino at Florence, and the "Belle Jardinière" in the Louvre—were all painted in Florence, and all produced on Florentine commissions. The Cardellino even emphasises this connexion still further, by having for background a view of the city with the Duomo and Campanile in the distance. The Madonna della Sedia, which is a tondo of the same subject, of the Roman period, was probably painted for one of the Florentine Medici. The Casa d'Alba, again, is an earlier tondo of the same class. The Esterhazy and the Garvagh form well-known examples of the self-same group. Once the type was formed, however, it became a favourite at Rome and elsewhere. To a like Florentine influence we must assign the Young St. John of the Uffizi, and the unusual size of the somewhat similar, though rather lumpy, St. John in the Madonna dell' Impannata, commissioned by the Florentine Bindo Altoviti. It is this local spirit which earlier made Filippo Lippi place St. John Baptist, as the patron saint of Florence, in the central position among the Medici saints (Cosmas and Damian, Laurence, and so forth) in the charming lunette from the Medici Palace, which now hangs on the walls of the National Gallery. I may add that this less conventionalised Florentine subject of Our Lady with the two children seems to me to be treated from the first by Raphael with far greater freedom and ease than the pure Madonna pictures: it is less devotional in feeling, and therefore allows greater variety and freshness of artistic composition—though I admit that already when he painted the Orleans Virgin he had thrown over, even for Madonnas alone, the last trace of mediævalism in design and sentiment.

The third type, also an old and conventional one, is that of the Madonna and Saints. In the Berlin example, with St. Jerome and St. Francis, we get the simple half-length form of this type exactly as Raphael received it ready-made from the hands of Perugino and Pinturicchio. The Saints in this work may be advantageously compared with the corresponding pair in Perugino's very similar work in the National Gallery. The Blenheim Madonna shows a further advance on Raphael's part in the management of this type. In order to test both its traces of universal early convention and its special advance on its Umbrian predecessors, it may be well contrasted, first, with the Borgognone of the Two St. Catherines, and the Mantegna of the Madonna with St. John Baptist and St. Mary Magdalen (both in the National Gallery), and then with the Perugino which hangs close by it. Later developments of this type are the still strangely Peruginesque Madonna di Sant' Antonio at South Kensington, and the Baldacchino in the Pitti, which, even before it was altered and muddled, owed much in design to the similar compositions of Fra Bartolommeo, the first Florentine who really transformed the "Madonna con vari Santi" of earlier art into that later and balanced form of group which we specially know as a Santa Conversazione. To the same sub-species, too, belongs the Madonna del Pesce, whose Raphael and Tobias may be instructively compared with the corresponding figures in the Perugino in the National Gallery.

The two "Heavenly Madonnas," or "Madonnas in Glory"—the Foligno and the Sistine—are beautiful variants on this type, partly derived from the old celestial Umbrian ideal, but, of course, largely modernised. It is noteworthy that both of these heavenly pictures were painted on what amount to Umbrian commissions—one for a Conti of Foligno, the other for a monastery at Piacenza, which may be regarded for artistic purposes as Bolognese-Umbrian. Like the Disputa and the Transfiguration, their spiritual as opposed to their technical ancestry is to be found to this day in many early ecstatic works in the Pinacoteca at Perugia.

The Holy Family type, on the other hand, is comparatively late, and may be largely traced, I believe, to the personal influence of Leonardo da Vinci. Indeed, it seems to me, if I may venture to say so, that a Leonardesque touch, as well as Leonardesque composition, is generally to be detected in such pictures as the Canigiani, and even the Madonna with the Palm. They may be usefully compared with the St. Anne of the Louvre and the "Vierge aux Rochers." And is there not also a tinge of Michael Angelo in the older characters? This is heresy, I know; but I cannot help feeling it. The Cordero is a minor variant on this theme, which later blossoms out into the Roman fulness of the Impannata and the Great Holy Family of Francis I. Of the Holy Family type, again, several interesting sub-types will shortly reveal themselves to any attentive student in the great galleries. I leave it to the reader to make his own classification.

Mr. Károly's charming collection, with the ease of comparison which it so pleasantly affords, has beguiled me into greater diffuseness than I at first contemplated. I will only add that most of his reproductions seem to me excellent, though a few, like the Perla, are from unsatisfactory photographs, while the glowing background of cherubs' heads has been entirely lost in the Madonna di San Sisto. Nor do I think it possible, in spite of great names to the contrary, for a careful comparer of types to put the purely Florentine Bridgewater Madonna at a much later date than its sister face in the "Belle Jardinière." I should have liked, indeed, from this point of view, to trace the evolution of the Madonna's features through the Gran' Duca and the Cowper to the Cardellino, the "Jardinière," and the Bridgewater, and thence slowly on to the "Vierge aux Candélabres," the Francis I., and the Sistine; but space and an editorial frown forbid me. The photograph of the "Candélabres," by the way, is taken from Sir J. C. Robinson's replica. It was the rival claimant to authenticity and originality—Mr. Butler Johnstone's example—that Kugler and Layard stamped with the seal of their high approbation. "Its present owner is unknown," says Mr. Károly of this last work. As a matter of fact, it is now in the hands of a well-known London firm, and is understood to be for sale. It were much to be wished that some wealthy benefactor would acquire it and present it to the nation.

Mr. Károly's book is one that no lover of art can afford to do without.

GRANT ALLEN.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MESSRS. MARCUS WARD & Co. announce the early publication, in two volumes, of a further selection of engraved portraits from the collection exhibited by the late James Anderson Rose, at the opening of the new Library and Museum of the Corporation of the City of London in November, 1872. This selection consists of over one hundred portraits of historical characters—monarchs, statesmen, reformers, generals, artists, writers. Accompanying the portraits are brief biographies, edited by Mr. Gordon Goodwin, who has also furnished, by way of preface, a memoir. A portrait of Mr. Rose appears as a frontispiece. The first selection appeared in one volume in 1874.

MESSRS. H. GREVEL & Co. will publish shortly, in a portfolio, a series of heliogravure plates, partly coloured, entitled A Modern Dance of Death, by Herr Joseph Sattler, who is well-known in Germany as a designer of book-plates.

THE exhibitions to open next week include: a collection of pictures by the late Charles Jacque, at the Hanover Gallery; and a series of water-colour drawings of "The Riviera and North Italy," by Mr. Ainslie Bean, at the Japanese Gallery—both in New Bond-street; and also a number of original drawings made for the Graphic and Daily Graphic, at 195 Strand.

A COURSE of five lectures, upon "Three Centuries of Italian Sculpture," will be delivered by Miss Hope Rea at Mrs. Jepling's School of Art, South Kensington, on Fridays, at 4.30 p.m., beginning this week.

It is announced that the Académie des Inscriptions, at its annual meeting last week, voted 1000 francs (£40) for the publication of the numismatic manuscripts left by the late M. Waddington. This refers, we presume, to his catalogue of the coins of Asia Minor, concerning which Mr. Barclay V. Head writes in the current number of the Classical Review:—

"This catalogue, the result of no less than forty years' study, is not merely a description of M. Waddington's own collection, valuable as that alone would be. It is a complete Corpus of the coins of Asia Minor, in all the great European cabinets, each of which was in turn visited and minutely examined by M. Waddington. Mionnet's readings (frequently lamentably deficient) were all either verified or corrected by him, and thoroughly reliable descriptions were added of hundreds of coins which are as yet unpublished.

At a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Heuzey communicated a report on the results of the eighth year of M. de Sarzec's excavations at Telloh, in ancient Chaldea. He dwelt specially upon the discovery of a regular layer of clay tablets, covered with inscriptions, the number of which, complete or fragmentary, may be estimated at about thirty thousand. It constitutes a storehouse of archives, going back to a remote antiquity: accounts, inventories (including inventories of the royal or sacred herds), contracts, deeds in duplicate bearing the names of the princes of Sirpuda and of the kings of Ur. Besides, M. de Sarzec has continued his exploration of the primitive strata which represent the fourth millennium before the Christian era, and has laid bare, beneath the palace of Tello, the solid base of Ur-Baï, a predecessor of Gudea. Thirdly, the exploration has been extended to Tella further to the south, where many monuments, sacred pebbles, fragments of the Stele of the Vultures, inscriptions, statuettes (several with the head perfectly preserved), have been acquired by M. de Sarzec.

THE STAGE.

"JOHN A' DREAMS."

MR. HADDON CHAMBERS's new play, "John a' Dreams," at the Haymarket, is the latest essay in polite melodrama. I say "polite," because the scene is agreeable, the story set forth with vigorous, even smart, dialogue, and the guests well dressed. But it is "melodrama," though polite: the subtle study of individual character is absent; the comedy, though welcome, is but occasional. It is no blame whatever to the piece, as pieces go, that it is made quite obviously for the theatre—that it demands the assistance, or to put it differently, that it meets the exactions of the actor; that instead of standing on its own merits as literature, it supplies the player with the ladder, the footbridge, and the scaffolding for his own particular performance. That is, after all, a play's function—at all events in a country in which audiences are less inclined to be occupied with problems than with personalities, and in which they assign to force of narrative and action a place denied to literary treatment. In France the thing is different. We hear a great deal here—and it is chiefly nonsense—about the "place of the modern drama." The place of the modern drama is, in truth, a humble one. By the magnetism of an actor, by the force of a story, a play may influence the public. But, having regard to its inevitable conditions, it will never be the means selected by the serious writer for the expression of his thought and feeling, and for the exhibition of the troops of characters it may be within his power to create. Mr. Haddon Chambers—although not the best—is at all events one of the best of modern English dramatists. Yet here, with him as with others, along with much that is interesting, with much that is truly observant, is the conventional character and the forced note and the stupid business of the opium-bottle. This sort of thing, if it corresponds to anything in printed writing, corresponds only to what is known as the padding in the novel of commerce—the ordinary three-volume novel.

One of a few good signs about the English Theatre—and it is a feature which, whatever it is owing to, cannot possibly be owing to Scandinavian influence—is the freshness of some of its comedy scenes. Even the followers of that passing fashion, which takes for granted that it is impossible for a woman to be interesting if she is not seriously soiled, turn from their rather shallow studies of conventional or actual transgression, and amuse us by observing with keenness some of our world's lighter ways. At more than one playhouse within a stone's throw of the Haymarket this is very perceptible. It is perceptible likewise at the Haymarket itself, where the sordid and not very skilfully imagined "past" of Miss Kate Cloud, played by Mrs. Patrick Campbell, interests us far less, has far less the air of reality about it, than the flirtations of Mrs. Wanklyn with "Percy," and the not unnatural, yet not very serious, objections which Mr. Wanklyn entertains to these proceedings. The fact is, that, even apart from the quite admirable manner in which these parts are played, Mr. Haddon Chambers has actually got much nearer to the creation of individual, recognisable character, in the conception and execution of these three good people, than in the conception and execution of his dreamy poet—a minor poet, after all, or he would never be a dreamy one—and of his sensual friend, who hungers for a woman as you hunger for food, and of the woman herself, who has been all her life in the mire, yet suddenly, as by the waving of a dramatist's wand, is to be fit at once for the high skies. No; no one seriously can take these beings as valuable studies from the world, as bits of nature touched properly with art. We see and shall forget them. What is more likely to last is one's remembrance of the funny ménage à trois, in which the husband, just at the right moment, asserts himself, good-naturedly, discreetly, with "surcout, point de zèle." These three are all of them very likeable people: Mr. Edmund Maurice, heavily and appropriately sensible as the legitimate lord; Mr. Ross, light, airy, brainless, perfectly good-natured, as the young man in attendance; Miss Janette Steer, handsome and natural, arch and pleased to be pleasing, and attired with admirably modern smartness, as the young woman who flirts.

A last paragraph—still about the acting; for the piece itself, which serves its turn sufficiently, which is neatly built and vigorously written, scarcely wants more comment. Mr. Nutcombe Gould, as a liberal and high-minded clergyman who is the poet's father, has a part which at least he can look acceptably. In nine things out of ten he can likewise act it. Then there comes an occasion, a moment, when very deep feeling needs to be expressed; and though that which is supposed to be an expression of it is never wanting in good taste, it is, also, never really convincing. "Suppressed emotion" on the stage is generally another name for emotion it would have been more desirable to fully indulge. As the poet, who is at least a chivalrous lover, and whom Mr. Tree makes agreeably picturesque, this admirable character-actor is seen at his discreetest, at his best considered, sometimes even at his most sympathetic, but rarely at his most forcible. The part does not afford him the fullest chance for that. Even the whole story of the opium-bottle—which falls on one—has not the redeeming feature of giving Mr. Tree the opportunity he presumably wants. His method of delivery, in other scenes, lacks variety; but, as I have said before, he is not unsympathetic, and he is very obviously careful and judicious—a measure of tenderness comes where it is most required into his performance of the part. Mr. Cartwright plays, with strong grip of a disagreeable character, with dramatic force and verve that is at least unquestioned, the part of the less worthy lover. Much interest has been felt in the appearance of Mrs. Patrick Campbell in the rôle of the besmirched but repentent heroine. The result, I take it, is that she has scored a succès d'estime. A triumph in Mrs. Tanqueray—which fitted her completely, and into which she completely entered—a failure in Dulcie Larondie, which, presumably, she completely misunderstood, but for which also, not less obviously, she was by nature never meant: these have been followed by a performance in which Mrs. Patrick Campbell re-establishes at all events the fact that she knows her business, that she knows the machinery of her art, but suggests to me the question whether her inspiration is not at the best but very occasional. Her performance is not a collapse; but I do not see in it any sign of penetrating sympathy, of intuitive knowledge of human nature, or of her personal possession of the magnetism which, on the stage and off it, counts for so much. In plain English, she is a capable woman, but leagues from being that great new actress London has been waiting for.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

MISS ANNIE C. MUIRHEAD commenced a series of educational concerts at the West Theatre, Albert Hall, on Saturday afternoon. She wishes to give Kensington children, "busy with school-work," and unable to go as far as the Queen's or St. James's Hall, opportunities for hearing music. She also proposes to give a similar series at Hampstead. But Miss Muirhead not only intends to provide music for the children, but to talk to them about form and musical ideas, to assist them, in fact, "to learn how to listen." The aim is an excellent one, and deserves every encouragement. In one or two matters last Saturday's programme was not altogether satisfactory. To name only one—a short part-song sufficed to show voices in combination, and something similar might have been done for instruments. The Haydn Quartet was too long for the object in view. Criticism, however, is here out of place. Miss Muirhead is making an experiment, and will doubtless, during the series, discover many ways of improving the concerts. She has been wise not to issue a synopsis of the whole series. The scheme, if carefully carried out, ought to prove eminently successful.

Josef Hofmann gave his only pianoforte recital at St. James's Hall this season on Monday afternoon. He has been for several years the pupil of the eminent pianist whose death occurred suddenly the very next day. The touch, the singing tone, the technique of the talented youth—everything reminded one of Rubinstein, especially certain gestures which he has unconsciously caught from his late master. Josef Hofmann is a pianist of immense promise; and if he works hard, and is not spoilt by success, he is not unlikely to prove the legitimate successor of the great Russian master. He gave an excellent performance of a Bach-D'Albert Fugue. After that came three of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte," of which the one in A from the first book was the best rendered. The performance of the Weber Sonata in D minor was most interesting, for the player entered thoroughly into the romantic spirit of the music. Weber's pianoforte works taxed even the powers of Rubinstein; and at times it was evident that Hofmann was overweighted by the difficulties, but he struggled bravely with them. Whether he was altogether wise in selecting that Sonata is, however, open to question.

Lady Hallé made her first appearance at the Popular Concerts on Monday evening. The programme contained no novelties, and may therefore be dismissed in a few words. Lady Hallé was in admirable form, and her playing of Dr. Stanford's delightful Irish pieces was most enjoyable. Mr. Schönberger performed Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata in D minor (Op. 31, No. 2). His rendering of the work was a thoughtful one, but mannered; he did not leave the poet-musician to speak for himself. Mr. Schönberger, who was much applauded and encored, is said to have been suffering from rheumatism in the right arm; and some of the passages in the finale of the Sonata seemed to show that he was not quite at his ease. Miss Kate Cove was a very successful vocalist.

Mr. Felix Mottl conducted what was announced as a "Wagner" concert at the Queen's Hall on Tuesday evening; the entire programme, however, did not consist of "Wagner" music. Mr. Mottl is a fine conductor, and has a splendid chance of winning popularity here; only let him be careful as to his choice of novelties and order of programme. The Introduction to the second Act of the late Emanuel Chabrier's "Gwendoline" is interesting; detached, however, from its surroundings, it conveys no definite meaning. But it was preceded by Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture No. 3 (a mighty tone-piece, appropriately described by Wagner as a musical drama), and by Wagner's highly exciting "Venusberg Music"; and either of these would have proved detrimental to any novelty, however strong. The "Venusberg Music," by the way, is wonderful, but it essentially demands the stage. The other novelty which immediately followed was Wilhelmj's "Festival March," which might be entitled "Hommage à Mendelssohn et à Wagner." The second part of the programme included excerpts from the "Ring des Nibelungen," all finely interpreted. Miss Marie Brema sang again the closing scene from "Die Götterdämmerung," and was in better voice than on the previous occasion. Her declamation is magnificent, but we repeat what we have already said—the part is too high for her. To sing such a grand scene must prove a great temptation to the gifted vocalist; but she would do well to resist it. The hall was crowded, and the Carlsruhe conductor was received with much enthusiasm.

We must defer notice of the interesting first concert of the Wolf Musical Union on Thursday afternoon until next week.

OBITUARY.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

WHILE Liszt was living he was regarded as the greatest of pianists; but for many years before his death that title was a complimentary one, for only on very rare occasions did he appear before the public. Rubinstein was his legitimate successor, and for nearly half a century held sovereign sway. He visited London early in the forties as a youthful prodigy. He did not return to this country until 1857, when he appeared at the Philharmonic Society and made his début at John Ella's Musical Union. His last visit was in 1886, when he gave his famous historical recitals. The programmes illustrated the literature of the pianoforte, from Byrd and Bull down to Liszt and Rubinstein himself. We live in an age in which pianists are constantly astonishing us with technical tours de force; some try to show us that even Liszt's difficulties can be exceeded. We doubt, however, whether any living pianist could be regarded as Rubinstein's superior. All great men have their weak moments, and Rubinstein occasionally used to love to startle the groundlings with his thundering octaves and widespread arpeggios; but, take him all in all, he devoted his great gifts to the highest service of art. As an interpreter of Beethoven he was exceptionally great: he not only understood the music, but felt its power, and revealed all its passion and all its poetry. His reading of the Appassionata was grand, and of all the pianists we have ever heard he was the only one who caught the true spirit of the Sonata in E (Op. 109). And although so great a Beethoven player, he could do justice to other composers, especially Schumann and Chopin. Nature had bestowed on him a wonderful touch: he could sing on the piano.

Rubinstein, like Liszt, despised the short-lived glory of even the greatest pianists, and sought after the higher fame of a composer. The catalogue of his works is immense; and it includes not only pianoforte pieces and songs, but chamber-music, symphonies, operas and oratorios. There lie scattered through his works ideas full of freshness and charm, and the workmanship is often exceedingly clever; but in his longer compositions the writing is most unequal. Side by side with passages of real power, there are others totally lacking in interest. Like Chopin, he was undoubtedly at his best in compositions of smaller calibre: many of his songs and pianoforte pieces have acquired a well-deserved popularity. He wrote many operas, of which only one—"The Demon"—has been performed in this country; but even with the assistance of great singers, and with the successful pianist at the conductor's desk, it only achieved a succès d'estime. In a letter to the Signale of June, 1882, he expounded his theory of sacred opera, and that theory he put into practice. The Oratorio as an art-form was not to his taste: he felt that sacred subjects should be exhibited on the stage, as was the custom, with the sanction of the Church, in the Middle Ages. He argued thus: "If the illustration of Holy Scripture by means of painting is no profanation, why should the dramatic method be considered so?" Popular opinion in this country is averse to such a practice, so that Rubinstein's sacred operas have never been heard here. "I am writing in this way," said the composer, "my 'Cain and Abel,' 'Sulamith,' 'Moses' and 'Christ,' whether the day of representation comes or not—no matter."

By Rubinstein's death the world has lost an accomplished man, a great musician; and one—let it be remembered in his favour—who was always kind to young artists, and charitable towards the poor.

HISTORY OF THE FREE CHURCHES OF ENGLAND FROM THE REFORMATION TO 1851.

By HERBERT S. SKEAT.

WITH A CONTINUATION TO 1891,

By CHARLES S. MIALl.

THE GUARDIAN.—"It is certainly a convenience to have the history of Dissent in England presented to a connected form, and from a Dissenter's point of view. And for these purposes we can recommend this, which gives the history in a handy and convenient form."

TIMES.—"As a complete exposition of the history of Dissent, from the Nonconformist point of view, it is no doubt certain to retain its reputation."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"Readers will find here in a clear and attractive form much information which cannot readily be found anywhere else."

THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW.—"It is essential that Dissenters and Methodist Churchmen should know why they stand apart from the National Establishment, and this knowledge can only come through the study of the ecclesiastical history of the last 300 years. . . . We ought to be specially grateful to Mr. Skeats and Mr. Miall for the light which they have shed upon the experiences of the Nonconformists of England."

LITERATURE.

Life of E. B. Pusey. By H. P. Liddon. Vol. iii. (Longmans.)

THIS volume deals with the history of the thirteen years from 1845 to 1858, which Dr. Pusey himself used to speak of as the Period of Struggle. It was the period which decided the question whether he and those who thought with him could keep their standing ground in the Church of England. His own personal position was indeed secure, after 1852, when Bishop Wilberforce withdrew his secret inhibition of Pusey from ministering in his diocese, except at Pusey; but the storms which he had already passed through filled him with alarm. When Archdeacon Denison and Bishop Forbes were attacked for their eucharistic doctrine, he could not feel safe till one charge had broken down on a technicality and another been dismissed with nothing worse than an admonition. The impression which the period makes upon a reader of the present day will be rather different: it seems a period of abortive effort. Keble and Pusey are busy with all sorts of projects—sisterhoods and commentaries, and a scheme for a model parish at Leeds. They are always drawing up manifestoes and protests, and holding meetings; but nothing seems to come of anything. The model parish collapses scandalously, the protests and manifestoes come to nothing; all that comes of the commentary is a belated catena on the Minor Prophets, with illustrations from archaeology and natural history fairly up to date. No doubt sisterhoods have flourished; but the movement did not spread from the little settlement in Park Village which Pusey organised to work in Dodsworth's parish.

The real importance of Pusey's work during these years—and it was very great—was that his patient, obstinate loyalty and his growing authority provided an excellent shelter for the considerable class who, while they purised what the Church of the Fathers and the Church of the counter-Reformation had (which no Reformed Church had then, if any has now), could be induced on one ground or another either to trust the Church of England or to distrust the Church of Rome. He risked a great deal rather than launch out in wholesale denunciations of Popery (which, as he pointed out, J. H. N. had done more daringly than anybody): they would have offended many whom he wished to "save," and would only have hardened them against his collection of proofs that much of the Roman system was modern. His sermon on the Rule of Faith during this period is very characteristic: there is not a line of guidance in it, not a word to help an undergraduate to answer the question, "What ought I to believe?" If in doubt, he was referred to the Fathers at large. But assuming an undergraduate to believe what the preacher held already, he was provided with an admirable case for believing it still. At this time Pusey was not a leader, if he ever was; but he was a watchman whose trumpet gave no uncertain sound, a standard-bearer who never lowered his flag: he held the fort in the midst of a growing cloud of skirmishers, who obeyed no signals, who kept no ranks, and were never driven from the field.

Beside this general impression, the volume has a good deal of episodic interest. One learns something of Pusey's views as to sisterhoods and his relations to them; more of the very significant disputes between him and Hook and Wilberforce, and his not untroubled friendship with Mr. Gladstone; much—many readers will say too much—of his own life. There are interesting glimpses of the imperious rectitude of Henry of Exeter, and of the dignified discretion of the future Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster. There are sidelights on the baptismal and the eucharistic controversy, and on university reform. There are also some very curious omissions: there is not a word about the Immaculate Conception or the Divorce Act; hardly anything about the Papal Aggression. Pusey was as self-centred as he was unselfish: what excited others did not necessarily interest him. He was quite impatient to see how many more cared for penitentiary than for preventive work. He obviously doubted whether a theory about slavery was worth the twenty or forty millions that had been paid for it. All he cared for was the proof that England might be reasonably expected to endow the Roman Catholics of Ireland without despoiling the Protestants. It comes out more clearly, perhaps, in this volume than in its predecessors that his munificence was reinforced by the classical prejudice against "luxury": a nation where the standard of expenditure of all classes was steadily rising was sure to be ruined—history proved it. He allowed nothing for the rapid growth of wealth or for the cheapening of production. The same ingrained conservatism and pessimism showed itself in another matter. At the time of the Gorham judgment, there was a general wish among such as thought with Pusey, that questions of doctrine as they arose should be decided by synodical authority. Mr. Gladstone, who was then capable of active interest in practical questions which did not necessarily affect the next general election, was zealous in the matter, but argued that, if the laity were to be bound by doctrinal decrees, they ought to have the opportunity of accepting or rejecting dogmas which bishops had an exclusive right to frame. Pusey rejected the proposal, not so much on the ground of absence of precedents (though these established their right to elect bishops, whose decisions they had no right to reject), but because, if the laity had any opportunity of voting on doctrine at all, they were certain in the long run to vote for heresy. In the same way, when Mr. Gladstone voted for the first time in favour of the emancipation of the Jews, Pusey told him he was preparing the reign of Anti-Christ, while careful to clear him of the charge of betraying his constituents. And yet there is no doubt that Pusey was enormously clever, as he proved by his extremely skilful evidence against the first scheme of university reform. He was not indisposed to the relaxation of local restrictions, he objected to the abolition of the poverty qualification for scholarships; but he threw his main strength into a very ingenious argument to prove the superiority of the tutorial system to the professorial. Under the latter there were no such things as standard works; everything that had been written five-and-twenty years was obsolete, and even the Germans envied an university which could still study Hooker and Pearson and Bull and Butler. Probably he was right: the Oxford system under which he grew up, though it did little for the advancement of knowledge, was an admirable discipline. Each generation learnt the same things, and each had the fruitful effort of understanding and judging what it learnt. Nine pupils out of ten of the most influential professor follow him without learning to judge. The professoriate was instituted in spite of Pusey's warnings; and for many years the event seemed to justify him, with one or two exceptions—the new professors were ornamental (which does not mean idle), and the real work of Oxford was done by tutors and coaches as before. A still stronger proof of his sagacity was that, in spite of everything, he took a lead from the first in the new Hebdomadal Council, though he employed the time which many of his colleagues wasted in talking for talking sake, in writing letters of spiritual counsel to Sisters of Mercy.

These are the only Sisters which Pusey seems to have thought of, at least till 1858: as in the Primitive Church most Virgins were contemplative, he probably preferred to copy the modern Church of Rome. The Park-place Sisters were practically district visitors, who lived together, and spent five hours a day among the poor; two hours were allotted to churchgoing, and four and a half to other devotions, including a translation of the Breviary, from which Pusey fondly hoped he had removed everything to which Bishop Blomfield could object. In this as in other ways his caution came short of prudence; from what is said and is not said in chap. viii., it is clear that at first his personal intercourse with Sisters, though, of course, perfectly blameless, was often compromising. Dr. Liddon, en revanche, is tantalisingly discreet; he does not give one letter to or from Miss Seddon, a really remarkable person, who certainly came to fill a large place in Pusey's life. Pusey often had to deal with the conflict between a religious vocation and real or imaginary family claims. We are not told how he dealt with it. He seems to have tried to confine himself to considering the duty of the family, who he held ought to be as ready to allow a daughter to leave home to be a Sister as to marry. We are not told what he thought of St. Jerome, who certainly spoke for his age when he wrote:

"Calcatum sperno patrem, siccis oculis ad crucem evola."

There is no lack of frankness in dealing with Pusey's relations with Wilberforce and Hook. It would certainly have been well if Wilberforce, when he came to Oxford, had asked the counsel of an older, a more learned, as he felt himself, a holier man, who moreover knew from inside the movement which was still distracting the university. Wilberforce did not ask advice; Pusey volunteered it all the more clumsily because he meant honestly and tried to be deferential to his bishop. All he gained by it was a lecture on his adaptations of Roman devotions and his want of humility. Pusey's self-aborrence was intense, habitual, unfeigned, and so was his self-distrust. He was really anxious to be guided—his letters to Keble prove it—and yet few men were harder to move. He consulted everybody, and took his own way. Many saints who enjoyed inward and outward prosperity and the answer of a good conscience as he never did, were much more ready to be overruled, much more willing to believe that Superiors who disagreed with them might be in the right. Indeed, he hardly recognised that in foro interno ecclesiastical superiors had any authority at all: they were to be obeyed, piecemeal, under protest, but never to be trusted. He appealed in good faith to the authority of the Church of England as a finger-post pointing to Scripture and Antiquity. He said himself that Newman had leant upon the bishops; he leant upon the Church, and very logically agreed with Keble that the less his bishop attempted to govern him the better. After all, so far as the Church of England can be said to have had a mind, Wilberforce and Hook knew it better; so far as it can be said to have a law, they were more loyal: they were Anglican Churchmen, he, though Newman coined the name for others, was a Patristico-Protestant. In the question raised by Denison, on which St. Augustine seems to have contradicted himself, Pusey had much ado to carry Keble with him; but when they had decided, although both agreed, their decision was not of faith, both were equally anxious to bind themselves to maintain it against any authority short of an Ecumenical Council. In spite of this Pusey had a right to complain of Wilberforce, who feared him almost as much as he distrusted him: he was afraid to prosecute him, afraid to inhibit him publicly: afraid to let him go to Pusey without officiating: afraid to deal the same measure to Stanley, who was sure to be less patient than Pusey, and, as he tried to believe, as yet less dangerous. The difficulty became acute at the time of the Gorham judgment, when Dodsworth was doing all he could, fairly and unfairly, to drag Pusey with him to Rome: proving, among other things, that, in fact, confessors had always required a special commission till the Tractarians revived the confessional. Pusey met the point in an ingenious and not uncandid pamphlet ("The Church of England leaves her Children Free to whom to open their Grievs"), and at last Keble and Gladstone succeeded in pacifying Wilberforce. Hook had a more serious grievance. He had done a great work at Leeds Parish Church: that work was imperilled by Pusey's attempt to do better by deputy at St. Saviour's; and, as Manning pointed out, it was absurd to send men there who were unsettled in order to establish their faith in the catholicity of the Church of England. As the St. Saviour's clergy came into Hook's parish (of which he could not be expected to forget that St. Saviour's had been part) to denounce his shortcomings, Hook was to be excused for losing his temper. Longley, no doubt, ought to have done something to prove himself a common father and a peacemaker: at that time he acted as a harsh partisan. Pusey was quite unaffected by repeated fiascoes whatever Hock, and even Keble, might say, he held fast to his patronage.

If he taxed the toleration of others he was tolerant himself. Long before the Gorham case arose, he had declared against driving out the Evangelicals who were not prepared to accept Baptismal Regeneration (which he never held to include a change of nature). When it arose, he deprecated legal proceedings as long as possible. When they began, he provided the bishop with both theology and precedents. When legal proceedings failed, he protested more loudly than Manning, who meant more. He really seems to have imagined that the sustained protests of a minority could prove a question to be closed which the supreme court and two archbishops had declared to be open. He met the question of the Royal Supremacy in a way of his own. He proved that orthodox emperors had exercised a predominating influence in ecclesiastical affairs to an extent which the seceders considered intolerable; he admitted that they had never set up anything like the Judicial Committee, whereupon he went his way groaning as hopefully as usual.

The full depth of Pusey's inward gloom is revealed in the chapter which treats of his first confession (to Keble), which he made in 1846, eight years after he had been in the habit of hearing confessions. Few readers will welcome the revelation. Those who recognise him as a saint will resent being made to see him as he insisted on showing himself to Keble, wrong side out, bemoaning his inability to whip himself to hurt, or even to beat upon his breast (his lungs were too weak), and drawing up a rule of life in which, among other things, he was never to smile, except upon children—even with this exception Keble thought the rule too harsh. He talked of himself as covered with leprosy and an utter wreck, and lamented his wasted gifts and graces. He was really lamenting his lost youth: he was never strong, and he habitually over-worked himself: the traces of fatigue in the letters which he wrote to Wilberforce, when he could hardly keep his eyes open, are really pitiable. This does not exhaust the matter. Pusey had a right to say, "When I am weak then I am strong." What distresses us was part of the price he paid for his impressive intensity. It does not follow that all saints have to pay it. The biographer appeals (among others) to the dying St. Augustine and St. Francis de Sales. Neither are relevant. St. Augustine had been a great sinner (which Pusey made it necessary to assure posterity he never was); but after his conversion he fully recognised both his own attainments and his position in the Church: he held that no Christian, however eminent or exemplary (did he ever contradict those who tacitly reckoned him among both?), ought to depart this life without a solemn season of penitence; accordingly, he shut himself up for the last ten days with the Penitential Psalm. As for St. Francis de Sales, he said, "L'abaissement et le mepris de soi doit être pratiqué doucement, paisiblement, constamment, et non seulement suavement mais avec allégresse et gaieté de cœur."

G. A. SIMCOX.

English Episodes. By Frederick Wedmore. (Elkin Mathews.)

THREE of these five "Episodes" are imaginative pieces of that high class of which Mr. Frederick Wedmore's "Yvonne of Croisic" and "A Chemist in the Suburbs" were previous examples. A reader without imagination might regard them as pleasant stories; but if he saw no more in them than the meagre incidents they record, he would miss their essential charm. Mr. Wedmore describes the whole five as "imaginative pieces." I confess that the second and third of the number seem to me to belong to quite another category. In the second, a swindler from New South Wales runs up a big hotel bill, which he does not pay, and trifles with the affections of the landlady's daughter: in the third, a small tradesman disappears from his home, causes his wife and family to believe that he has been drowned, and takes another name, and lives with another woman, a few miles off. These are perhaps true episodes of English life—as also of life not English—but no imagination was needed for their conception, or could fitly be employed upon their treatment. Well enough in their place, they do not deserve the refinements of style which Mr. Wedmore bestows upon them. Having said this, I have no other word of deprecation to offer. Indeed, the three pieces that remain possess quite enough merit to atone for the undesirable proximity of the two others.

These three have nothing in common except the quality which makes each of them excellent. Love is more or less the theme of all three, but the aspect differs in each instance. In "The Vicar of Pimlico" the tender passion is peculiarly tender. It dawns upon the still youthful heart of a middle-aged clergyman rather as a mild suffusing flame than as a consuming fire. And it comes in the person of a young girl, who first interests him by the unsophisticated grace of her presence and the modest frankness of her nature. It is a new experience to the middle-aged man, who does not, in fact, realise that it is an experience until, pursuing the rule of his life, he finds that there is something he must put away if he would maintain that single devotion to his work which makes for him the sum of duty. But this putting away is not done without a pathetic effort. One felt inclined to question, at first, whether he should have written the letter in which he told Millicent Sergison that he loved her, but that he was not for her nor she for him. Mr. Wedmore, however, is right. It could not hurt Millicent—it could hardly fail to raise her self-respect—to know that such a man had loved her. The very declaration of his feeling was a benediction. If disappointment came with the knowledge that there was to be no tie and no further communication between them, it would not be a lasting shadow, for she was only twenty, and youth has a time of conquest before it. "The New 'Marienbad-Elegy'" is a sort of converse to this study of renunciation in middle-age of the young love that might have been won. Here we have an amiable dilettante—a poet and lover of art—who goes to Buxton to get cured of an attack of gout which his non-appointment to the Laureateship has aggravated. At Buxton the charms of Sylvia Rawson gradually steal upon his somewhat coddled affections, and he finds that there is a possibility of joy in life with which the delight of producing immortal verse, or the rapture a perfect etching may excite, cannot compare. But Sylvia remains placid and unmoved, and it turns out that she has had her time of love, and that for her the dream has passed. The third piece, "Katherine in the Temple," is much slighter than the other two, and in a different vein from each of them; but it is as true, as human, as idealised as they.

It is his power of idealising, and the delicate effects he produces, which give distinction to most of Mr. Wedmore's work. You are sensible of an atmosphere in which the refinements of life expand and flourish—an atmosphere too highly rarefied to sustain the coarser forms of experience. The subtleties of a dainty style are very winning in this book. One sometimes feels, in reading Mr. Wedmore, that the sentences are too richly laden for a structure of so delicate a character. Sentence within sentence, and parenthesis within parenthesis, carry what for the moment seems too full a largess of good things. But one would not have it otherwise. These elaborations are like the facets on a gem—they give colour and brilliancy. The colour is abundant. How well it comes out in such a passage as this:

"Sylvia Rawson—it is difficult to describe her, except by saying that she would give warmth and dignity to any landscape you placed her in. She has almost everything—colour, expression, and, though not absolute faultlessness, a singular distinction, of form. Tall, erect, supple; now walks with energy; now lounges largely, like an Albert Moore, warm and full. Her eyes deep grey, her cheek brown and rose-colour, her hair brownish gold. Beauty, and the supreme beauty of health. The wind and the sunshine have done it, for the nature that was made for them!"

Among the numerous other passages I have marked here is one which contains an admirable Wedmoresque theory of what is best in woman:

"Elle est très femme—likes to be liked; rejoices modestly in her good looks, her freshness, and her vigour; holds by the old ways; believes in God and Man; looks out with reverence on the unsolved mystery of the great Beyond. Would you have her different? How one compares her with that other type, the product of the lop-sided education of the middle-class, and of the modern prosperity of cities—a type shallowly learned through theories and books, angular, bloodless, spectacled, unsexed; with fads and fancifulness in place of imagination—full of cheap negations and vulgar denials. One need not finish the outline. And back to her I come, to end with the phrase that I began with, because it is itself an eulogy. She is of her own sex—of her own sex entirely. Elle est très femme."

Certainly these three English Episodes are worthy successors of Mr. Wedmore's Pastorals and Renunciations, and with them should represent a permanent addition to the literature of the generation.

GEORGE COTTERELL.

The Meaning of History, and Other Historical Pieces. By Frederic Harrison. (Macmillans.)

THIS volume consists for the most part of historical lectures delivered at various institutions at various times during the past thirty years. About half of them have already been published in the form of magazine articles, but some of the best now appear in print for the first time.

Mr. Harrison's abilities as an historical writer are fully recognised by many who do not at all agree with the philosophical views of which he is so earnest an advocate; and they might wish that he had given us more books like the present. There are no better specimens of popular work, in a good sense of the word, than are to be found in several of these pieces.

The first essay, on "The Use of History," is an admirable vindication of the study; and even better is the succeeding chapter on "The Connexion of History," in which we have a brilliant sketch of the world's progress from prehistoric times. Of course, in such a rapid survey, there are points to which exception might be taken. Mr. Harrison has been completely carried away by the modern tendency, in which we may also trace the influence of his philosophical school, to glorify Julius Caesar. He describes him as a "consummate general, orator, poet, historian, ruler, lawgiver, reformer, and philosopher in the highest sense, the statesman magnanimous, provident, laborious, large-hearted, affable, resolute, and brave."

It may be permitted to enter a protest against this tone of indiscriminate eulogy; and, heretical though the opinion may be, to question whether we have really any solid ground for attributing to Caesar any policy but enlightened and far-seeing selfishness. Many of the grand schemes for the benefit of humanity so freely ascribed to him appear to exist only in the imagination of his admirers; and it is difficult to find any confirmation of them in the authentic records of the time, as Prof. Seeley long ago showed in his excellent essays on Roman Imperialism. Then, surely, the praises of humanity and magnanimity are very strangely bestowed on the perpetrator of such a deed of cold-blooded cruelty as the death of the gallant Vercingetorix years after he had voluntarily surrendered himself to save his people. It cannot even be pleaded on Caesar's behalf that he merely followed an evil custom of universal observance before his time, though such an excuse would hardly be sufficient in the case of one who is represented as being so transcendently beyond his age in every respect. But, in fact, though it was unquestionably a very frequent Roman practice to put captive leaders to death, still the tradition had been broken through. No captives were slain at the triumph of Caesar's great rival, whom it is the fashion systematically to depreciate, though this was celebrated nearly twenty years before his own. And after his time there are but few cases of the old barbarous custom, and many striking instances to the contrary. It may seem ludicrous to compare the poor hen-pecked pedant Claudius with the "divine" Julius; but certainly the former's treatment of Caradoc stands out in bright contrast to his predecessor's conduct towards Vercingetorix. Caesar then must bear the blame of having been one of the last to follow an atrocious practice, and that under circumstances of peculiar aggravation.

In a lecture delivered to vacation students at Oxford on "Some Great Books of History," Mr. Harrison gives some useful advice about the choice of historical works by the general reader, though objections might be raised against certain of his recommendations.

The chapter devoted to "A Survey of the Thirteenth Century" is a graphic summary of the chief features of what the author truly recognises as the real culminating epoch of the Middle Ages, after which "the flower, the brilliancy, the variety, the poetry, the soul of the mediaeval world, were never again seen in so rich a glow." It is, however, a questionable generalisation to say that "at the opening of the thirteenth century Christendom as a whole rested united in profound belief in one religious faith," and to contrast the beginning of the century with its close in this respect. It would rather seem that the latter half of the twelfth century had been marked by a widespread revolt against the Catholic system, which in the thirteenth was to a great extent suppressed. The Albigenses were certainly numerous enough in Southern France to be made the victims of one of the most infernal wars of extermination recorded in history before the completion of the first decade of the century. Does Mr. Harrison think they all sprang up in those few years? On the contrary, there is abundant evidence to show that the whole country of Toulouse and Languedoc had been described by Papal legates as almost in possession of the heretics as far back as 1178; and there were at the same time numerous anti-Papal sects (chiefly Manicheans) in Italy, Flanders, and other parts of Europe. It is thus certainly incorrect to say "there had appeared in the age preceding teachers of new doctrines, but their new ideas had not at all penetrated to the body of the people."

In the papers, entitled "What the Revolution of 1789 did" and "France in 1789 and 1889," Mr. Harrison gives an eloquent and much-needed vindication of the good done by the French Revolution.

The tendency of late has been to speak of the Revolution as something solely evil, as a gigantic calamity in the history of the human race, to celebrate which, as France did in 1889, was as great an absurdity as it would be to "celebrate the centenary of the Earthquake of Lisbon, or the Black Death." So far have certain writers gone in the way of palliating the abuses of the old régime, that they have denied that the body of the French people really possessed any substantial grievances before the Revolution; and it has been seriously asserted that the condition of the masses in France is worse now than it was in the last century! These two chapters of Mr. Harrison will themselves be enough to supply abundant facts in disproof of such statements. One point in particular may be referred to, which it is painful to dwell upon, but about which the truth must be told if we are to judge the Revolution fairly—the judicial barbarities constantly practised under the old monarchy.

"Preliminary torture before trial, mutilation, ferocious punishments, a lingering death by torment, a penal code which had death or bodily mutilation on every page, were dealt out freely to the accused without the protection of counsel, the right of appeal, or even a public statement of the sentence. For ecclesiastical offences, and these were a wide and vague field, the punishment was burning alive. Loss of the tongue, of eyes, of limbs, and breaking on the wheel, were common punishments for very moderate crimes. Mme. Roland tells us how the summer night was made hideous by the yells of wretches dying by inches after the torture of the wheel. . . . To all but the rich and the privileged a civil cause portended ruin; a criminal accusation was a risk of torture and death."

Let it be remembered in justice to even the worst of the Revolutionists, that they were content with simply killing: they left the refinements of torture to such champions of the old system as the Royalist insurgents of La Vendée, who are commonly regarded as faultless heroes of chivalry.

In another essay Mr. Harrison notes a very common English misapprehension concerning the termination of the Revolutionary period, in speaking of "Carlyle's famous 'whiff of grapeshot,' which he oddly enough supposed to have closed the Revolution." Carlyle so speaks of the overthrow of the Royalist sections in the streets of Paris by the troops of the Convention in 1795 as to convey the impression that the Revolution came to an end then for good; and as the name of Bonaparte plays a prominent part in the narrative, it is likely that many readers may run off with the idea that the latter's assumption of supreme power took place then instead of four years later. The mistake of fixing 1795 as the end of the Revolution has found its way from Carlyle into the majority of English books, including even Mrs. Gardiner's excellent little sketch. But, in fact, the period of the Directory is as essentially revolutionary as that of the Convention; and the obviously true terminal date is the actual establishment of his despotic authority by Bonaparte in October, 1799, which is adopted by all French writers and also by our best recent English historian, Mr. Morse Stephens.

Perhaps the most interesting essays in the volume are those to which Mr. Harrison prefixes the general title of "The City in History." The series commences with a paper on "The City: Ancient, Mediaeval, Modern, Ideal," which is followed by others on the principal historic cities of Europe—Rome, Athens, Constantinople, Paris, and London. In treating of Constantinople, Mr. Harrison makes an emphatic protest against the contemptuous depreciation of Byzantine history which till lately was universal among English writers. Indeed, he would seem himself to have shared the prevailing feeling when he wrote, "For the true sequence of history we must fix our view on Europe, on Western Europe alone: we leave aside the East." This passage occurs in an essay which, as we learn from the preface, was written as long ago as 1862; and the author's tone is now very different. "Mediaeval and modern annals offer to the student no subjects of meditation more fascinating and more mysterious than are the fifteen centuries of New Rome."

In the concluding chapter on "Palaeographic Purism" Mr. Harrison runs a tilt against the reformers of conventional spelling, whether in Greek, mediaeval, or Oriental names. His line of attack no doubt seems plausible to many; but it may be doubted whether he does justice to the case of those eminent scholars who have been so much denounced and ridiculed for their orthographical innovations. It is not reasonable to contend that, if any change at all is to be made, we must be rigidly consistent: it is surely an intelligible principle to leave names which have put on an English dress or have become very familiar in a particular form in their usual shape, and at the same time to endeavour to restore the original spelling in the case of others which have neither become Anglicised nor in any sense familiar. There may be good reasons against endeavouring to represent Oriental words exactly by an elaborate system of diacritical marks most alien to the genius of our language; but this has not much to do with the question why we should be compelled systematically to Latinise every Greek name. The resources of our own alphabet are perfectly competent to represent the Greek forms; and it cannot reasonably be contended that, in the mass of cases, they are really any less English than the Latin. By compelling the youthful student when translating Greek to mangle and distort all the proper names that he meets with, we throw a needless stumbling-block in his way. As a reviewer of Grote remarked long ago, "It is a mere annoyance and a sort of barbarism to be compelled to pronounce these names one way when reading Greek, and another when translating into English." There may in some cases be a doubt as to the original pronunciation; but there can be no question, as Grote said, that "our own K precisely and in every respect corresponds to the Greek K," and, in fact, in sound to the Latin C as well; but the English C becomes an S before several vowels, and by employing it for the Greek K we are simply "gratuitously taking a wrong letter in preference to the right."

And there are weighty historical reasons for the reform. As Freeman says, for those who shut up Greek history within the narrow range of one or two centuries it may save trouble to write the names in Latin fashion; but the historian who takes a wider view of the subject must have some principle of spelling that will hold good for all ages, and the only intelligible rule to go by is as far as possible to preserve the contemporary orthography. In fact, the controversy between Latin and Greek spelling is very largely one between those who look upon the history of Greece as a mere subject for dilettante scholarship, and those who feel that it is a living thing with a practical bearing: not that it is intended to deny Mr. Harrison a place in the latter class.

R. SEYMOUR LONG.

Two Summers in Guyenne: a Chronicle of the Wayside and Waterside. By E. H. Barker. (Bentley.)

It is always pleasant to meet a book written by Mr. Barker. We are sure of finding there honest and truthful observation. He does not take facts at second-hand, but tells us simply what he sees and hears. He makes no pretension to a knowledge greater than he possesses. He does not pose as a scientific botanist; yet he has an eye for every wayside flower. He talks no aesthetic jargon about art; but his descriptions of architecture, even if not technically correct, enable us clearly to picture to ourselves the buildings which he depicts. He does not affect to be an historian; but the historical details which he gives are usually taken from the best local history, and are very different from a mere guide-book summary, or a confused reminiscence of a school or popular history. But where his writing has a real and serious value is in the details of the habits, the ways of life, the work, the thoughts and aspirations, of the peasants among whom he sojourns. No writer within our acquaintance gives a more faithful and trustworthy account of the people of the country through which he passes. And this is done apparently without effort, almost unconsciously, without pedantry of any kind: we have the record of each day's tramp, with all its fun or pathos, as well as with its instruction.

The scene of the present work is what is generally known as the Dordogne country: from the rise of the river under Mont Dore in the Auvergne to its junction with the Gironde below Bordeaux. It is the basin of this river, with those of its tributaries, the Vézère, the Isle, and the Drome, which is here described. The district is interesting in many ways: not least on account of the memories and traces which still remain of the time when it formed the borderland, the debateable ground, between the English party and the French during the English domination of Guyenne. Many pages might almost serve as an illustrative commentary to Baring Gould's novel now appearing in the Illustrated London News. Strange, indeed, are the dwellings in which the necessities of war, and of life by plunder, compelled men then to take up their abode. The whole country is still marked with the scars of war. War in the times of Caesar, wars with the English, religious and civil wars, and peasant revolts, and, above all, the Revolution, have all left their traces here. And in the later times, when Renaissance architecture was added on to the feudal castles, when the castellan was no longer a mere fighting man with his arms against everyone, when these older sites were occupied by men like Brantôme, Montaigne, Fénelon, and Montesquieu, their habitations are still more lovingly described. But above all else, the instinct of the tramp is strong in Mr. Barker. After the hard canoe voyage down the Drome, where it is difficult to say whether wood, or clothing, or skin, suffered most, his outward man became so dilapidated that he was never sure of a reception even at a country inn. A return to sartorial respectability must have been a comfort for a time, if only to allay suspicion.

But to speak of some of the matters from which we may learn. If Mr. Barker had had time for deeper research, I think that he would have found that the communal moorland mentioned on p. 52 could not be had absolutely for nothing. No rent would have been paid for occupying it, but the Commune could not relinquish its rights as over-landlord. Very curious and varied are the unwritten tenures, or rather customs, by which such lands were held, and stranger still the fact that such tenures are remembered and enforced. A man might plant trees or any other crop on such a tenure, by permission, on the communal land, and the produce was his till the stock died off, whether it were cereal or pasture for so many years, or trees that lived through centuries, or the threefold renewing of the vine—in any case, he could not sell the land; though he enjoyed without charge all that could be got from it, yet at the close of the period it would revert to the Commune. So, too, when he mentions the fierce hatred which sometimes existed, and still exists in milder form, between neighbouring villages. Almost always I have found that this has been the result of different tenures. On the same great estate the inhabitants of one parish might hold their land on fairly equitable terms, with practical freedom, and the next parish hold theirs on the most oppressive feudal terms, and with the most irritating restrictions, from the same lay or ecclesiastical over-lord. Hence the hatred which comes of futile envy, hence the cry for equality overmastering that for liberty.

The instance mentioned on p. 197 of neighbours collecting to mow the landlord's field without other pay than two huge meals, seems to me to be a remnant of a system of things of which fuller traces are found farther south, which I have named the vicinal system: it marks one of the stages of the passage between collective and individual landed property. The Metayer system, as Mr. Barker remarks, is by no means coming to an end in France; but it is one that cannot be improvised, it depends so entirely on mutual honesty and trust and forbearance. Most unexpected is the remark of the Trappist Monk, on p. 268, as to those who begged of the monastery,

"Men looking for work?" I asked innocently. "Yes"; replied the monk, without moving a muscle of his stolid face, 'and who pray to God that He will not give them any.'"

Is this an echo from the outer world, or is it the genuine experience of the Trappists, who have done so much to help their poorer neighbours to work with profit in the wilds of the Double?

To turn to art, or rather to architecture, Mr. Barker follows others in deriving the Perigord domes from Venice. I believe them to be far older in origin. The building which Peter of Perigueux describes in the latter half of the fifth century in his poem, "De Uita Martini" (Lib. V., 536), beginning with the line—

"in conum surgens turritae molis in altum mirificum tendebat opus,"

seems to me to be a clumsy description of some ancestor of these domes of the Perigord. Why does Mr. Barker sneer at the "lavabos"? The custom of washing at them I grant is offensive; but the structures themselves, and the rarer torch-holders in the old open chimneys, are often some of the finest specimens of the potter's (not porcelain maker's) art to be met with in Southern France.

I may just mention two printer's slips, easily remedied: a "not" has slipped out in p. 332, l. 17; and Castres (p. 393) is above, and not below, Bordeaux.

Mr. Barker has added to the debt that all his readers owe him for a truer acquaintance with that land of Northern Aquitaine, which he has made his study and his residence for many a delightful year.

WENTWORTH WEBSTER.

NEW NOVELS.

The God in the Car. By Anthony Hope. In 2 vols. (Methuen.)

A Drama in Dutch. By Z. Z. In 2 vols. (Heinemann.)

Her Own Folk. By Hector Malot. In 2 vols. (Heinemann.)

Peter's Wife. By the Author of "Molly Bawn." In 3 vols. (White.)

The Highway of Sorrow. By Hesba Stretton. (Cassells.)

David Pannell. By Mrs. Alfred Marks. (Hutchinson.)

Amygdala. By Mrs. Edmonds. (Bell.)

Lesser's Daughter. By Mrs. Andrew Dean. (Fisher Unwin.)

His latest is the strongest book that Mr. Anthony Hope has written. The advance this author has made is remarkable; but till The Prisoner of Zenda and The God in the Car, he had not gained that difficult step in the path of the great writer, flexibility. Able, brilliant often, sometimes significant, always interesting, as he is in his earlier books, Mr. Hope wrote as a skilled amateur with the rapier fences: that is, with knowledge and skill, but without that masterly ease which is synonymous with victory.

The Prisoner of Zenda is delightful in its kind; but The Indiscretion of the Duchess proves that this kind is not one which the author should cultivate too assiduously. In The God in the Car Mr. Anthony Hope has concentrated his powers on the portraiture of an individual. The story is, in fact, little more than the representation of Willie Ruston, an Englishman of a remarkable type, the type which includes such men as Sir Richard Burton and Mr. Cecil Rhodes. Every other personage is subsidiary: even Mrs. Dennison, who stands out clear and convincing, and is not only the most interesting person in the book after Ruston, but the chief influence in his career and character. In actual life Ruston was a man to win his way by domineering energy; and in the novel which is his record, the reader is, in like manner, won against his will. The "man of Omofaga" was a filibuster by nature; a law-abiding citizen by the fortune of hazard. He had the makings of a great captain; but he had in excess the defects of those qualities which characterise great captains: insensibility to the claims, needs, and sufferings of others; callousness before sorrow, disaster, and the death of the most intimate friends; savagery against opposition, more brutal than manly—in a word, a prodigious amount of vital energy and a barely perceptible leaven of human kindness. He was a man who by no possibility could make any woman happy. Naturally, therefore, he had an overwhelming fascination for some women. The central interest in The God in the Car is the three-part duel between Ruston, Mrs. Dennison, and Fate. Ruston believed he could win all things; Mrs. Dennison craved to win one thing in losing all else; Fate with quiet indifference made other arrangements. The story, I think, is too long. Occasionally the author has been tempted into "asides" which do not strengthen his narrative, and once or twice weaken it: as in the case of Ruston's taking a friend's children for a walk and indulging them with cakes and ices. It is, in itself, a pleasing episode: it might well be characteristic of a man of Ruston's type: but it is utterly out of keeping with the actual "man of Omofaga." Notwithstanding that the story is a novel of character rather than of complicated and rapid movement, it is not so carefully written as we have a right to expect from Mr. Anthony Hope. He has one irritating and unscholarly fault: an excessive use of the "dash." I open The God in the Car at random, and at pp. 236-7 of vol. ii. find no fewer than sixteen of these superfluous annoyances. Again, too frequently there are clumsy and even obscure locations: for example,

"The nuances of a woman's attraction towards a man, whether it be admiration, or interest, or pass beyond—whether it be liking and just not love—or interest running into love—or love masquerading as interest, or what not, Willie Ruston recked little of."

Again, is it worth while for the author of The Dolly Dialogues solemnly to enunciate such a obvious truism as, "He was a man, and a young man. He liked women, and clever women—yes, and handsome women"? Finally, is Mr. Anthony Hope an amateur steeplechaser that he should come to grief over his "do's," and prepositions and other small fences: as in, "But to spend your time thinking of or about women, or, worse still, of or about what women thought of you, seemed poor economy of precious days—amusing to do, may be, in spare hours, inevitable now and again—but to be driven or laughed away when there was work to be done."

There is, I repeat, too much of this kind of thing in Mr. Anthony Hope's new book. He is so able and entertaining a novelist that many will regret if they see him lapse into the mere producer. The God in the Car, so good in the main, so subtle and clever, and often so deft and sprightly, is not without its omens, to which Mr. Anthony Hope would do well to pay heed. There is another car of Juggernaut than that in which, for his brief hour, Ruston of Omofaga was god.

It was to be expected that the success of Mr. Maarten Maartens would attract others to follow his example. It would not be fair, however, to let it be inferred that "Z. Z." is a mere imitator. He has found the genre congenial, and has adopted it; as a promising art student, suddenly brought under the influence of Velasquez or Rembrandt, might follow as his own a method which was best for his development and advantage. "Z. Z." may be English, or a Hollander capable of literary expression in our language; but I am inclined to believe, from internal evidence, that he is, rather, an Anglo-Dutch resident in London, English in the main, but with an innate nostalgia for Holland and Dutch life. There is reserve in this first venture, which is a strong indication of good work to come. There are not many novelists who, at the last, would have let Peter Van Eijk leave the stage of the somewhat narrow but, to him, poignant drama, wherein he is the most attractive actor, without either a conscious rapprochement between himself and his unknown son, or at least a suggestion that they might one day find happiness, the one in the other. There is, in A Drama in Dutch, the convenient local colour which is the result of experience or careful knowledge. The personages are well delineated; but it is probably a matter of temperament whether one can enjoy, or weary of, company such as theirs. The hero, called Martin Roberts (though, unknown to himself and others, really Maarten Van Eijk), is an industrious, but not very interesting, young man. The merchant, Peter Van Eijk, notwithstanding the slight space he occupies, is by far the most memorable character. Even he, however, is sketched too loosely. In the writer's mind he has been apprehended, but not realised. One or two of the minor personages—Mrs. De Griendt, with her overwhelming vulgarity, the clerk Vroom, with his proud ownership of a galloping consumption, a second wife, and a passion for free feeding, all on eighteen shillings a week—are well depicted. It will be interesting to see how "Z. Z." will develop. At present, he lacks not only Mr. Maarten Maartens's literary skill, but also his serene outlook, his breadth, his wise sanity.

M. Hector Malot has written so many novels, that the recent announcement, to the effect that he would write no more, is less of a misfortune than might be supposed. He is one of the many who produce fresh editions rather than new books: that is to say, the third novel is little different from the first, or the thirtieth from the third. There is more range, more individuality, in a single work of Balzac, than in many a "collected edition in thirty volumes." But M. Hector Malot has always deserved well of his countrymen. I fancy his countrywomen read him less approvingly. For he is of the cohort who sustain the Young Person. He is as harmless, while protesting the guile of the snake, as Kate Cloud's inane lover in "John-a-Dreams." The representative French father, weary of authors who thrum away at the well-battered notes, Du Sang, de la Volupté, et de la Mort (apologies to M. Maurice Barré's new book!), turn to writers like M. Hector Malot, who are sure not to give Mademoiselle too near or too vivid a picture of life. But, while this really able and, in his own way, excellent romancist, is not a man who will create even the smallest eddy in the sea of literature, it must be admitted that he does not distort the realities in the manner of his more popular rival, M. Georges Ohnet. This romance, which Lady Mary Lloyd has translated with sufficient skill, is distinctly at its author's highest level. Moreover, it is less "missy," more actual, than any other of his books I have read. Her Own Folk is an interesting story, of a kind of which we have so great a quantity in this country, that it is a matter of surprise the translator set herself to add to the number.

Peter's Wife may be regarded as another futile flotsam from that derelict, the three-volume novel. Frankly, it is books of this kind to which is due the success of the long-delayed revolt against the continued existence of what had become a paralysing evil. Mrs. Hungerford is, I believe, a popular writer: justly, no doubt. Molly Bawn, Nora Creina, and other novels from her pen, must be familiar to the assistants at all circulating libraries. But even the high spirits and praiseworthy industry which characterise Peter's Wife cannot redeem its weariness as an exposition of life, its dreary conventionality in method, thought, and style. The story improves in the third volume; and probably there are many readers who will accept it all with pleasure, including the innumerable dashes and asterisks which, to a few less ardent enthusiasts, must be as wire-fences in a fox-hunting country.

Mr. Marion Crawford is one of the most versatile of living novelists. One is never sure what to expect from him, and that alone conduces to his wide popularity. The American in him is becoming more pronounced than the Roman-American; and there are fewer excursions to lonely English parishes, Munich byways, and mysterious Bohemian castles. Love in Idleness is a pretty little love-story: pretty in its setting, in its sentiment, in its style, and, I may add, in its "get-up." Its format, indeed, is delightful: in size, shape, flexibility, as well as in its type and binding, no better pocket volume is on the market. The scene of the story is a much frequented seaside resort not far from New York; the chief dramatis personæ are Fanny Trehearne and Louis Lawrence. There is also a dangerous but unsuccessful rival; and three ladies rather relentlessly depicted as ludicrous old maids, whereas they are simply thwarted in their true vocation. The narrative is occupied with the peculiar form of flirtaciousness affected by the heroine. The book might be entitled "The Aggravatingness of Fanny." But at last Miss Trehearne ceases from troubling; and, despite a bump on the head from the boom of a cat-boat, the hero is made happy. Something of the freshness and brightness of that Bar Harbour sea, that blithe air, has passed into Love in Idleness; if, likewise, something of the chilly atmosphere, the unredempting light. The little book is one of the cleverest and daintiest things Mr. Marion Crawford has done. Those who think A Cigarette Maker's Romance one of his best books, will rank Love in Idleness even higher than do those who, like the present writer, find his highest achievement in To Leeward and A Roman Singer.

Miss Hesba Stretton is opportune in the publication of her Highway of Sorrow. The tragic history of the persecuted Stundists has moved all Europe to sympathy, and all enlightened people to indignation bordering on disgust. There are many Russians and Germans who palliate, even if they do not approve, the extreme of action against the Jews; and mistaken, cruel, and impolitic as these Jüdenhetze measures may be, there can be no question that Israel in Germany, and still more in Russia, gives cause for much hatred, resentfulness, and alarm. In the instance of the Stundists there is no such move at work. These people are quiet, earnest, right-living, peace-loving people, akin to our Quakers. All they want is to worship God in their own way. There is much interesting and authentic information about them and their lives and opinions to be gained from Miss Hesba Stretton's book; but, over and above this, the Highway of Sorrow may be read for its own sake, as a romance charged with a strange and moving pathos.

Mrs. Alfred Marks, better known perhaps by her maiden name as Mary Hoppus, has already won, and particularly by Masters of the World, a well-deserved reputation. David Pannell should not only sustain this reputation, but signally enhance it. It is admirably and reticently written, and as a study of conscience is singularly acute and convincing. Pannell is an artist, a flower of genius (or talent rather), sprung from a rude soil, and nurtured amid uncongenial circumstances. He goes to Rome, and, to be succinct, flourishes on the head of an acted, though an unspoken, lie. The story turns upon this insincerity; upon its effects on himself, on the woman he loves, on his career. "Pannell was so much afraid of telling a lie that he forgot to be anxious to tell the truth": therein is the pity, the pathos, and the commonplace tragedy of the man's life. "He might have been original, if he had not been afraid": therein is a keen recognition of his fatal flaw, and of the flaw of many another; for true it is that innate courage, as distinct from physical hardihood, is inseparable from genius. Let me add that Mrs. Alfred Marks's new story has Rome for its background, and that for lovers of the Eternal City there is an enhanced pleasure in her extreme economy of description. There are places whose names are a sufficient evocation. Who wants descriptions of the wind-haunted Baths of Caracalla? David Pannell is a striking book, and is as welcome for its scrupulous style as for its subtle analysis, its profound human interest.

For the two remaining books, or booklets, on my list I have nothing but a word of cordial recognition of their merits. Amygdala—in consideration of the title, why is the cover-ornamentation not an almond-spray?—is a sympathetic, interesting, and well-told episode in the Greek War of Liberation. Mrs. Edmonds is well known both as a poet and romancist; and all who have had pleasure in her prose and stories of contemporary life among the Hellenes should read this daintily-printed and prettily-bound romance. It is pleasant that one of the best examples of cheap and artistic book manufacture now procurable is so worthy of its charming setting.

Mrs. Andrew Dean's powerful and enthralling study, in one of the many phases of contemporary Judaism, is the forty-third addition to the "Pseudonym Library." It seems to me one of the ablest volumes in that, on the whole, able and entertaining series.

WILLIAM SHARP.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Use of Life. By the Right Hon. Sir John Lubbock, Bart., M.P. (Macmillans.) The commonplace book of a wide and thoughtful reader must necessarily have a value, and that value is largely increased when—as in the present instance—the reader is a man of affairs as well as of letters. Apothegms are apt to stick in the throat instead of the mind. Sir John Lubbock's great merit is that he is able to render a good many dry morsels of knowledge easy of digestion, and thus convert them into actual food for the mind. The topics discussed in this essentially "handy" book include pretty well all that engage men's thoughts nowadays, and, indeed, some about which they seldom think at all. Among the former may be classed health, recreation, money matters, and education; among the latter, it is to be feared, patriotism, citizenship, character, and the Christian graces must have a place. On all these, as well as on other scarcely less important subjects, Sir John has collected much, and expresses it so pleasantly that we are sure he will escape the fate of the New Zealand convert of whom his chief told the missionary that "he gave us so much advice that at last we put him to death." Indeed, to curtail the existence of the man who is doing his best to show us how to make the most of life would be a worse than parricidal act. "Full of wise saws and modern instances," full of wit and wisdom gathered from every sort of field, this little book is just the kind of companion to have at hand. It suggests thoughts; it answers questions without troubling us to ask them; it reasons and does not dogmatise; it is cheerful, humorous, charitable, and conscientious; it is never intrusive, and it will be our own fault if we allow it to become a bore. "There is nothing men are so anxious to keep as life," says Sir John, "and nothing they take so little pains to keep well." They are now shown how to do it by one who is himself an example as well as a teacher.

The New Standard Elocutionist. By Alfred H. Miles. (Hutchinson.) To transcribe the whole of Mr. Miles's closely-printed title-page would be an appalling and space-devouring task: so we will only say that, in addition to some 500 pieces suitable for recitation, his volume contains a treatise on the anatomy, physiology, and hygiene of the vocal organs, by Mr. Lennox Browne; a chapter on the art of introducing musical accompaniments into elocutionary recitals, by Mr. Clifford Harrison; and a very full and practical educational introduction, dealing with both the selection and the rendering of the pieces, by the editor himself. Of course, as a matter of fact, all that is most essential in the art of elocution can only be learned from the example and personal instruction of a proficient; but everything that can be taught in print is taught most admirably and sensibly in Mr. Miles's essay, which is really more valuable than the work of his collaborators, though professional elocutionists and advanced amateurs will find something interesting and helpful in Mr. Clifford Harrison's note on musical accompaniments. Mr. Lennox Browne's paper is a lucid and instructive little treatise; but much of it is necessarily apart from the practical necessities of those who will use the volume. The collection of pieces both in prose and verse seems to us varied, inclusive, and in every way admirable; and we see no reason why the book should not become what it claims to be—a "standard" work. Various favourite selections from the work of Lord Tennyson have been excluded, we presume by copyright restrictions, but they are easily accessible elsewhere, and there is no lack of choice. We confess we are quite unable to understand why some poems—thus distinguished from the rest by no obvious consideration—are printed in the form of prose. If some, why not all? though the question we feel most disposed to ask is, why any? The metrical form is a real assistance to the memory; and though the eccentric printing may be regarded as a safeguard against sing-song, it tends to obscure the rhythmical feeling which every competent reciter must desire to preserve and embody. Still, when all deductions are made, the book remains one of the best manuals of its class.

The Humour of Spain. By Susette M. Taylor. Illustrated by H. R. Millar. (Walter Scott.) The humour of Spain is so abundant that it is almost impossible that any two selectors from it would choose the same examples. After having with utmost care filled the pages of any ordinary volume, there would still remain a huge mass from which we might doubt whether another better selection might not be produced. Even when telling old-world tales, the common property of many lands, the Spaniard often adds something which makes them smack of the soil and gives them a raciness not found elsewhere. Of this there are several examples in the present volume. The editor has done her work well. Few of the translations are original, but they are taken from the best sources. The selections made are far better than we should have expected from that curious sentence on the first page of the Introduction: "Here alone 32,000 persons were condemned to the Auto-da-fé!" We miss, however, a few pieces that we should have expected. The celebrated sonnet to Violante by Lope de Vega (or whoever may be its author) is not given. Often as it has been imitated, the original seems to be genuinely Spanish. An excellent version of it may be found in Lord Holland's Life of Lope (p. 204), and several others are in existence. Fernan Caballero might have been better represented than by a folk-lore tale. Some of the dialogues in her novels are full of humour. The "notes critical and biographical" are a useful addition. They contain, however, a few slips. Shelton, not Shenton, is the name of the first English translator of Don Quixote. The Cronica del Cid was printed at Burgos in 1512, not 1552. Why is only half a line given to Leopoldo Alas (Clarín), a better critic in his own line than Blanco Garcia, whom our author too exclusively follows? More might have been said of Selgas, whose serious work is far superior to his comic writings. The tale from Hartzenbusch is one of seven, written to console a friend for the cropping of her hair in fever, all the heroines of which are deprived of their luxuriant tresses. This fact adds greatly to the fun. But the selection is distinctly good, when all is said, and few readers will regret being thus introduced to some of the rich humour of Spanish literature.

Tales of the Masque. By J. H. Pearce. (Lawrence & Bullen.) Mr. Pearce has written one or two books that had distinct merit. We may reasonably look to him for consistently good work; for at his best he writes exceedingly well. Sometimes, however, he struggles against his better judgment, and on these occasions he is not so pleasant to read. His Tales of the Masque make but a tiny book, and we could wish they were all successful. But we are bound to blame some of them, to feel annoyed concerning others. Yet our verdict is one of nearly unalloyed praise; for better work than "Leah," more exquisite episodes than "A Voyage to the Golden Land," have not been submitted to us for many a long day.

The Revolted Woman. By C. G. Harper. (Elkin Mathews.) The contents of this book are by no means of such a kind as its impudently attractive appearance seems to suggest. Instead of finding dainty yet malicious little essays, we are plunged into an angry controversy on most serious subjects. Mr. Harper is greatly in earnest; his temper is not the most amiable, and he has plenty of pluck. Though not a polished writer, frequently mistaking brutality for epigram and abuse for argument, there is vigour in his style. Moreover, he is so amazingly and indiscreetly honest that we forgive him all his trespasses in the matter of bad grammar and bad taste. When he keeps his temper under control, he manages to say a good many shrewdly sensible things. He has the advantage, too, of being almost entirely in the right. Up to now no one has spoken so courageously; therefore we weaker ones, who have only dared to think, should be willing to ignore most of his faults.

Overheard in Arcady. By Robert Bridges. (Dent.) Mr. Robert Bridges is fortunate in his name. Whether he is lucky in other respects we leave an open question. For our own part we acknowledge that half his book rests unread. Mr. Bridges must turn to more patient and more capable critics. His work seems to us superfluous and inadequate. Had he caught the manner, or an echo of the manner, of Stevenson and Howells, there were no difficulty in pleading for him. But he has failed so absolutely that none could tell, listening to the reading of his pages, which strove to parody Will o' the Mill, and which Silas Lapham. Mr. Bridges writes good English: there is nothing slovenly or crude about his work. He has failed to do that which he set out to do, and there is an end of the matter. That he will yet produce stuff worth considering is probable, for he knows the mechanical part of his business and has humour; also his style, when not judged as an imitation of the work of others, is distinctly easy. Though his book is a failure, it is the failure of a man who knows how to write—who will do well when he has found his subject.

Muggleton College: its Rise and Fall. (Constantable.) Though it were absurd to call the story of the rise and fall of Muggleton College literature, it would be unjust to abuse it. Neither better nor worse than the usual run of such productions, it will amuse a good many readers. The writer who aims only at being humorous generally bores the intelligent. The author in this case has been wiser than some of his rivals, and has made his fable as short as possible. The satire is not without point, and the scheme of the story is really funny. One merit distinguishes it above most works of this class: it is not at all vulgar, which quality goes a good way to disarm criticism.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR's new book, to be entitled The Foundations of Belief: being Notes Introductory to the Study of Theology, will be published by Messrs. Longman & Co. early in January.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN will shortly send to press a new poem by Mr. Alfred Austin, called England's Darling; but its publication may be postponed till after the appearance of a second volume of The Garden that I Love. Mr. Austin is likewise engaged on a volume of critical essays, to bear the title The Bridling of Pegasus.

MR. R. M. GARNIER, author of a History of the English Landed Interest, will shortly publish with Messrs. Swan, Sonnenschein & Co. a work entitled Annals of the British Peasantry. It is virtually a history of the labouring class, commencing from tribal times and ending at the present day.

MR. GEO. F. BLACK, assistant keeper of the National Museum of Antiquities at Edinburgh, has in preparation a work dealing with Scottish Charms and Amulets, to be published by Mr. George P. Johnston. Mr. Black is desirous of making the work as complete as possible, and will be grateful to anyone for information of such Scottish charms or amulets as have not hitherto been described. All assistance given will be acknowledged in the work.

THE new volume of the "Irish Library," published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin, will appear in the course of about a fortnight, under the title of The Irish Song-Book. The editor, Mr. Perceval A. Graves, has collected the best Irish lyrics from the time of Tom Moore to that of W. B. Yates and Katharine Tynan. An appropriate Irish melody is printed over each song.

MESSRS. GINN & COMPANY announce a series of handbooks on the history of religions, under the editorship of Dr. Morris Jastrow, professor of Semitic languages at the University of Pennsylvania. The first of the series, which is already at press, is The Religions of India, by Prof. E. W. Hopkins, of Bryn Mawr. This will be followed, in the course of next year, by The Religions of Babylonia and Assyria, by the general editor; and The Religion of the Ancient Teutons, by Prof. P. D. Chantepie de la Saussaye, of Amsterdam.

IN Madame Blavatsky and her "Theosophy," which Messrs. Swan, Sonnenschein & Co. will shortly publish, Mr. Arthur Lillie gives a popular account of the Russian lady and of the evolution of her Mahatmas, including also a sketch of the old Theosophists of the West. The book has chapters comparing her teaching with genuine mysticism of the Buddhists and the Brahmin Yogis.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. have in the press two new reading-books for elementary schools, to be called The Citizen and the State. Part. I., by Mr. E. J. Mathew, will deal with "Representative Government"; Part. II., by Mr. J. St. Loe Strachey, with the "Industrial and Social Life of the Empire."

THE first volume of "The Time-limited Series" announced by the Roxburghe Press, will be Phantasms, consisting of a collection of short stories illustrating posthumous personality and character, by Mr. Wirt Gerrare, who, in an introductory preface, expounds his own theory of apparitions. The book, to be issued immediately, will not be on sale after March 31, 1895, and no further edition will be issued during the continuance of the copyright.

MESSRS. DIOBY, LONG & Co. will publish shortly a new work by Mr. James J. Moran, entitled Irish Stew.

AMONG the latest additions to "Darton's Penny Popular Library" will be Tales by M. Betham Edwards, L. T. Meade, and Helen Shipton. This series already includes stories by Miss Peard, F. Scarlett Potter, Christabel Coleridge, and the author of the "Atelier du Lys."

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co. are preparing a new issue of The World of Wit and Humour, which will include a selection from the humorous writers of the present day, with illustrations by F. Barnard, G. G. Fraser, C. L. Pott, Tom Browne, Max Cowper, Jack Yeats, C. Glover, Bernard Partridge, and Gordon Browne. The first part will appear on December 20.

MESSRS. JAMES CLARKE & Co. have in preparation a new edition of Biological Religion, the reply to Prof. Henry Drummond's "Natural Law in the Spiritual World," by the late Dr. T. Campbell Finlayson. The last edition was published in 1885.

WE understand that the Bookworm in its present form will be discontinued at the end of the present volume, in view of a fresh and more comprehensive departure at an early date.

THE December number of the Antiquary will contain articles on "English Glassmaking," by Mr. E. W. Hulme; on "Staves of Office," fully illustrated; and on "Bishop Gibson's Visitation of the Diocese of London in 1738," by Dr. Sparrow Simpson.

A CHURCH Historical Society has been formed at Sion College, under the presidency of the Bishop of Peterborough, and with Canon G. F. Browne, of St. Paul's, as chairman of committee. The Bishops of Durham, Oxford, and Salisbury have also promised their help. The special objects of the society are, to maintain the true historical position of the Church of England, and to turn the attention of students to the salient points of the Church's history in relation to its present position.

AT the London Institution, on Monday next, Mr. Edmund Gosse will deliver a lecture on "The Literary Movement of the Century."

AT the meeting of the Elizabethan Society, to be held at Toynbee Hall on Wednesday next, Mr. Sidney Lee will read a paper on "Thomas Nash, Satirist."

AT the meeting of the Viking Club, to be held at the King's Weigh House Rooms on Friday next, at 8.30 p.m., Dr. Jon Stefansson, of Copenhagen, will read a paper on "Scandinavian Influence on English Literature."

THE opening meeting of the Indian section of the Society of Arts will be held at the Imperial Institute on Thursday next, at 4.30 p.m., when Mr. W. Lee-Warner will read a paper on "Roman and British Indian Systems of Government."

MESSRS. SOTHEBY will be engaged next week in selling two libraries that are interesting chiefly on account of their former owners. On Monday, that of the late Lord Ebury, which is characteristic of the first half of the century. Of theology proper, there is less than might be expected; of novels, little besides Scott; of poetry, little besides Byron. But history, travels, art, and politics are well represented. The prize of the collection is a set of portraits of the members of Grillon's Club (1813 to 1863), which very rarely comes into the sale-room. The other library is that of Sir Edward Bunbury, the still living author of the History of Ancient Geography, though no copy of this book seems to be included in the catalogue. There is, however, an admirable series of works relating to classical archaeology and numismatics, geology and geography, as well as a number of early printed Italian books. We may also mention some twenty versions of "Reynard the Fox."

WE hear from Florence of the death of Mr. Paget, the father of the lady who writes under the pseudonym of "Vernon Lee," and the stepfather of the poet, Mr. Eugene Lee Hamilton.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

IN Congregation at Oxford on Tuesday, the preamble of the statute establishing degrees in research—which was summarised in the ACADEMY of last week—was approved on a division by a majority of eighty-nine votes to twenty. But considerable opposition was expressed to the details of the scheme, especially to the constitution and powers of the proposed Delegacy, and notice of a number of amendments has already been given.

PROF. BEVAN, Lord Almoner's reader in Arabic at Cambridge, proposes to deliver a public lecture on Thursday next, upon "The Rise of the Abbasid Dynasty."

MR. W. R. MORFILL, reader in Slavonic at Oxford, was to deliver a public lecture on Friday of this week, upon "Bohemian Literature in connexion with the Hussite Movement."

MR. E. H. HANKIN, of St. John's—now professor of bacteriology at Agra—has been appointed to represent the University of Cambridge at the Medical Congress to be held at Calcutta in the course of the present month.

A PAINTED window, in memory of the Rev. S. S. O. Morris, who lost his life while nobly performing his duty as naval chaplain on board H.M.S. Victoria, has been placed in the chapel of Jesus College, Oxford, of which college he was formerly a scholar.

THE subscriptions to the fund raised at Manchester in memory of the late Prof. Milnes Marshall amount to a net total of £760. Out of this, it has been resolved to invest £650 for the maintenance of the biological library presented to Owens College by the relatives of the late professor, and to devote the balance to providing a gold medal to be competed for annually at the college athletic sports.

WE have received the twenty-sixth annual report of the Delegacy of Non-Collegiate Students at Oxford. The total on the books shows a steady increase, though the number of undergraduates has not yet attained the high figure at which it used to stand between 1875 and 1884. The graduates now amount to 252. During last year, as compared with 109 entries, no less than 22 migrated to colleges, while 46 left without taking a degree. But of these last 35 were special students, admitted without examination, with the object of pursuing some branch of study apart from the Arts course. It seems noteworthy that the school most affected by Non-Collegiate Students is that of theology, where they have won 11 first classes out of 21 in all subjects. Those who migrated to colleges have gained 10 more firsts in theology, and also 14 in natural science. The same predominance of divinity is shown in the list of university scholarships. Besides the endowment recently founded by Mrs. Richard Shute, and exhibitions awarded by the university on the results of the Local Examinations, exhibitions ranging from £25 to £52 10s. are offered by three City Companies—the Grocers, the Clothworkers, and the Leathersellers. Apart from the provision of buildings, &c., it appears that the university subsidises the Delegacy with an annual grant of £1,000—which seems rather hard upon the surviving halls.

We quote the following from the Paris correspondence of the Times:—

"Two facts of interest were mentioned to-day [November 27] at the opening of the session of the University Council. At all the colleges the boarders are decreasing and the day scholars increasing—a proof that parents are becoming sensible of the moral and sanitary superiority of home life. At the faculty of medicine there are 1,002 foreign students to 4,142 French, and of the former 169 are women, whereas there are only 26 Frenchwomen.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

PART AND COUNTERPART.

The infant soul made up of images
Is like a lake, itself almost unseen,
But holding pictured in its "pure serene"
The sky above and the surrounding trees;
Till o'er the surface creeps a rising breeze,
And slowly ruffles into silver sheen
Those depths of azure fringed with branching green,

A flame that follows on a form that flees.

As intermingled with the flow of being
It loses sight in gaining sympathy,
So action quenches all our primal seeling:
We cannot be both part and counterpart
Of outward things, and that passivity
A poet praised is half the poet's art.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE most interesting article in the current number of the Jewish Quarterly Review (David Nutt) is the obituary notice of Joseph Perles, by Prof. Bacher, of Budapest. Perles was by birth a Hungarian Jew; but he was educated at Breslau, under Frankel, Grätz, and Bernays, and was for the last twenty-three years of his life Rabbi of the Jewish congregation at Munich. He was not only a learned Talmudist, but also possessed a thorough knowledge of Syriac, Arabic, and Persian, by means of which he was able to throw much light upon early Jewish history and traditions. The longest article is that by Mr. Claude Montefiore, on "The Religious Value of the Fourth Gospel." This is followed by a first instalment of the Arnold Essay, won this year at Oxford by Mr. B. Lionel Abrahams, the subject being "The Expulsion of the Jews from England in 1290." The present portion, which is only introductory, describes the economical position of the Jews under the Norman and Angevin kings, and the hostility towards them of the lower baronage, to whom Edward I. owed his succession to the throne. It is enough to say now that the author's attitude seems to be strictly impartial. Mr. G. Margoliouth briefly describes a collection of MSS. from Teheran, which have been acquired recently by the British Museum, their peculiarity being that, though the language is Persian, they are all written in the Hebrew character. Finally, we must mention that Mr. A. Cowley gives a preliminary account of the Samaritan liturgical works, which he is editing for the Clarendon Press,

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE NEW SYRIAC MS. OF THE GOSPELS: ST. MATTHEW I. 1-17—SPURIOUS BOTH ON EXTERNAL AND INTERNAL GROUNDS.

Oxford: Nov. 28, 1894.

All scholars of the past, as well as of the present, have felt the difficulty of giving any rational explanation of the genealogies that are found in St. Matthew and St. Luke. This unsatisfactory state of things might have continued indefinitely, but for the most happy discovery of Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson. The invaluable Syriac MS. of the Gospels which they found in the Convent on Mount Sinai has at last supplied us with the key to this hitherto insoluble problem.

The best way of setting forth the solution I have to offer will be to recount the actual path I pursued in its discovery, though, like most discoveries, it dawned unexpectedly upon me when studying this MS. with other purposes in view.

First of all, when engaged in comparing this MS. word for word with the Curetonian and the Peshitto, as well as with the Greek Text and Latin Versions, I found that, whereas its strange reading of Matthew i. v. 16, was in some measure supported by the Old Latin and Armenian Versions, its peculiar readings in v. 25 were practically devoid of such support. Thereupon, it struck me that in verse 16 we had possibly the primitive text, possessing as it did in some degree the most ancient attestation, and that in verse 25 we had merely the unsupported correction of a scribe. Now the literal rendering of this 16th verse, which has already been the cause of such conflicting conclusions, is as follows: "Jacob begat Joseph: Joseph to whom Mary the Virgin was espoused begat Jesus, who is called Christ." Here we have exactly what one would expect a priori to find in a genealogy of Joseph. By this reading every difficulty of exegesis is removed. If this text is the primitive one, it makes verses 1-17 a consistent whole, and supplies us with an Ebionitic genealogy of Jesus, which represents Him as the natural son of Joseph. Before pursuing this question further, we might turn aside for a moment to remark that the idea of Jesus' natural descent from Joseph could not possibly have been in the mind of the writer of verses i. 18-25. This is clear from verse 19, "And Joseph her husband being a just man, and not willing," &c.; hence we must reject, both on internal and external grounds, the Ebionitic readings in verses i. 18-25 in the Syriac MS. as due to wilful corruptions of the text. Here, then, in this chapter—if for the moment, we may assume the above text of verse 16 to be primitive—we have two distinct documents confronting each other: the former representing Jesus as the natural offspring of Joseph, the latter representing His birth as distinctly of a superhuman nature. The question now arises: is there any means of determining which is the work of the Evangelist or writer of the complete Gospel? The answer is not far to seek. All internal grounds determine in favour of the latter being the work of this author. The spiritual presuppositions of i. 18-25 and of the rest of the First Gospel are the same, and exactly the same method of citing Old Testament prophecy is followed in both; whereas in i. 1-17 no attempt is made to cite Old Testament prophecy bearing on the Davidic descent of the Messiah, although a better opportunity could not have presented itself than that given at the close of this section. But we are not obliged to trust wholly to internal grounds. We have excellent external attestation in Justin Martyr (Ap. i. 33, Dial. c. Tryph. 78), and in Tatian's Diatessaron (ii. 1-8), where both these writers reproduce i. 18-25, but altogether omit any reference to verses i. 1-17. In the case of Justin it is the substance, not the form, of these verses which is reproduced. I might here adduce also an interesting fact, which I owe to Dr. Sanday, that the Irish Latin MSS. place the initial letter of the Gospel not at verse 1, but at verse 18.

It is now time to return to the question we waived for the time being, and to discuss the actual value of the text in verse 16 of the Syriac MS. This, of course, cannot be done except in connexion with the Latin Version; and, with a view to expedite this comparison, we shall now render the Syriac text of verse 16 into Latin. This would be: "Iacob genuit Ioseph: Ioseph cui desponsata erat Maria Virgo genuit Iesum qui vocatur Christus." Let us now compare with this the text of perhaps the best representative of the Old Latin Version—i.e., k, the fourth century Codex Bobbiensis, so splendidly edited by Bishop Wordsworth and Mr. Whyte, with Prologomena by Dr. Sanday. In this MS. the text runs exactly as follows:—

maria genuit Iesum Christum."

Here we have manifestly a lacuna. At first I thought that the text presupposed by this MS. could be restored from the Syriac MS., and so I arrived at the following restoration:—

"et iacob genuit iosef [et iosef] cui desponsata [erat] virgo
maria genuit Iesum Christum."

An examination, however, of b, the fourth century Codex Veronensis, made it clear that the lacuna must be restored differently. This MS. reads: "Jacob autem genuit Ioseph | cui de | sponsata erat | virgo Maria | Virgo autem | Maria genuit | Iesum. . . ." The lacuna, therefore, must be filled up with Maria virgo, and erat must be inserted before virgo. Thus k is not only inferior to b in leaving a lacuna, but also in omitting before virgo the substantive verb erat, which (as we shall see) belonged to the primitive text; for it is found in the Old Syriac MS. (which for brevity we shall henceforth designate Sin.). It is also found in the Curetonian MS. (designated henceforth as Cur.), the text of which, rendered into Latin, runs: "Jacob genuit Ioseph eundem cui desponsata erat Maria virgo illa peperit Iesum Christum."

From Sin., Cur., and b we now see that desponsata erat was the verb in the relative clause and not genuit, as we find in c, d, g, q, which simply reproduce the text of k without the lacuna. The text in c, d, g, q, is indeed ancient, as it is found also in a, a fourth century MS.; and we must therefore take account of it along with b, as affording two different and possibly contemporary methods of dealing with a difficult text. In neither, indeed, is the original text reproduced. This is clear from the use of the word genuit. This word is used in the preceding verses about thirty-eight times, and always of the father, in the sense of "begetting," while the word used of the mother in verses 21, 23, 25, in the sense of "bearing," is pario. Here, therefore, we have the Old Latin Version making the strange statement that "Mary begat Jesus." This anomaly did not wholly escape notice in early times; for we find that the scribe of d has changed genuit into peperit, and thus removed this grotesque phraseology. And yet the scribe was wrong and the older MSS. were right. The genuit here points back to Joseph as its nominative, as we find it in Sin.; and hence we must regard the words "Maria virgo autem" in b as an undoubted interpolation. By omitting these and restoring Ioseph autem before cui, as it is the subject required by genuit, and is likewise found in Sin., we arrive at not merely the primitive text, but also the text from which it is possible to explain the later readings.

* Gigno is used occasionally of the mother, but the entire context is against this use in the present instance. It was this possibility of its use in the sense of "bearing" that induced the scribe to leave it unchanged when he tampered with the rest of the verse.

As Cur. somewhat closely agrees with b (compare, for instance, "virgo autem Maria genuit" with "illa peperit," these two may point back to a common Greek text, such as Ἰακώβ δὲ ἐγέννησε τὸν Ἰωσήφ ὃ μνηστευμένη ἦν ἡ παρθένος Μαρία ἥ δὲ (ὁ ἢ δὲ παρθένος Μαρία) ἐγέννησεν Ἰησοῦν τὸν Χριστόν. On the other hand, these may have been independent, though parallel, corrections of the text. At the risk of being tedious, I must draw attention to the fact that in the text of b, and implicitly of k, the corrector tries to remove the obvious unorthodoxy of the text by omitting Ioseph autem after Ioseph, and compensating for this omission by repeating the Virgin's name thus: "Jacob autem genuit Ioseph cui desponsata erat virgo Maria virgo autem Maria genuit Iesum." But to place "virgo autem genuit Iesum" as a parallel fact with "Jacob autem genuit Ioseph," and the thirty-eight exactly similar statements preceding, betrays in itself the hand of the corrector, and hardly calls for serious confutation by means of Sin. and MSS. a, c, d, g, q. In Cur. we have on the face of it a similar secondary, though less inconsistent, text.

Having now shown that Sin. alone preserves the primitive text, though this text is actually implied by the Old Latin and Armenian Versions and the Curetonian Syriac, we are able to restore the Greek text that stood originally in Matt. i. 16. It was as follows:

Ἰακώβ δὲ ἐγέννησε τὸν Ἰωσήφ, Ἰωσήφ δὲ, ὃ μνηστευμένη ἦν Μαρία ἡ παρθένος, ἐγέννησεν Ἰησοῦν τὸν λεγόμενον Χριστόν.

As regards the text of i. 16 in the Greek MSS., there is no other course open to us than to regard it as a deliberate correction made towards the close of the second century or early in the third. How deliberate and thorough-going this correction was, will be best seen by comparing the restored Greek text just given with that of Westcott and Hort:

Ἰακώβ δὲ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰωσήφ τὸν ἄνδρα Μαρίας ἧς ἐγεννήθη Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγόμενος Χριστός.

In these days, when scholars are beginning to recognise the value of the Versions, the conclusion at which we have arrived will not appear startling. The Greek MSS. have now practically had their say; the last word, unless older Greek MSS. are discovered, has yet to be said by the Versions.

To sum up. (1) Every open-minded student must confess with Meyer on Matt. i. 16, 17 (note):

"it must be admitted that the genealogies owe their origin to the view that Joseph's paternal relation was real . . . and that he was the actual, and not merely the putative, father of Jesus."

(2) This view, that Joseph was the natural father of Jesus, is actually what we find in the new Syriac MS., and the same text was undoubtedly at the base of the Old Latin and Armenian Versions.

(3) Whereas, however, in i. 1-17 we have an Ebionitic genealogy of Jesus, in i. 18-25 (which belongs organically to the First Gospel) we have an account of the superhuman birth. Hence i. 1-17 was wrongly prefixed by the final redactor of the Gospel, or more probably by a mere scribe. It was added, in all likelihood, to the First Gospel, and not to the Second, on two grounds: (a) because in the former we have an account of the infancy of Jesus; (b) because a genealogy tracing the descent of Jesus from Abraham seemed to have a special fitness in a Gospel addressed first and mainly to Jews. On similar grounds another naturalistic genealogy, supplying the ancestry of Jesus back to Adam, was inserted in the Third Gospel, but most clumsily; for it will be obvious, even on the most cursory examination, that Luke iv. 1 should follow immediately upon Luke iii. 22. This genealogy likewise has been tampered with, in order to adapt it to its new environment. In the Syriac MS., instead of "was supposed" we have "was called," which, according to the familiar Hebrew idiom = "was." There is some approach to this in the conflate reading of MS. a of the Old Latin. Tatian omits this genealogy likewise, and there is no reference to it in Justin. The reference which some scholars think they have found in Dial. c. Tryph. 100 to Luke iii. 23-38 has in reality to do with the genealogy of Mary and not of Joseph.

(4) These genealogies were probably not incorporated universally in the Greek MSS. before 170 A.D. In their original uncorrected form they held their ground in the Greek Gospels possibly for only a few decades. During this short period the Old Syriac translation was made. The original text, however, soon gave place to some form resembling that found in the Curetonian MS. and in Old Latin and Armenian Versions. Finally, this form gave place early in the third century to the radically different text which is now found in all Greek MSS.

(5) On purely critical grounds, therefore, we are led to the conclusion that the First Gospel originally began with i. 18, and that the primitive account given by this Gospel proceeds wholly on the supposition of the superhuman birth of Jesus the Christ.

R. H. CHARLES.

The Palace, Salisbury: Nov. 23, 1894.

May not the omission of the words "he knew her not until" (Matt. i. 25) in the Old Latin MS. k be due to a different cause from that suggested by Mr. Conybeare in his letter printed in the ACADEMY of November 17?

A friend—the Rev. H. L. Goudge—has suggested to me the possibility of the sentence being omitted in the interests of the belief in the perpetual virginity of the Virgin Mary; and on examining the whole passage in k, I noticed that there is a corresponding omission in v. 20 which points the same way. That verse runs "ne metueris mariam uxorem tuam," &c., without "accipere" or equivalent, as if the scribe were wishing to make it plain that Joseph was never intended to marry Mary. No other Latin MS. that I know of omits either "accipere" in v. 20, or the clause in v. 25.

A VARIANT IN THE "VITA NUOVA."

Oxford: Nov. 23, 1894.

Will you allow me to call the attention of your readers, and, in particular, of those who may have purchased "The Oxford Dante," to the following (as I venture to think) very interesting variant, which, by an unfortunate oversight, was not introduced into the text of the Vita Nuova lately published?

In § xxx. Dante, speaking of the date of the death of Beatrice—i.e. (as commonly supposed), June 9, 1290—says:

"Io dico che secondo l'usanza d'Italia, l'anima sua nobilisima si parò nella prima ora del nono giorno del mese; e secondo l'usanza di Siria, ella si parti nel nono mese dell' anno; perchè il primo mese è ivi Tisria, il quale a noi è Ottobre. E secondo l'usanza nostra, ella si parti in quello anno della nostra indizione cioè degli anni Domini in cui il perfetto numero nove volte era compiuto in quel centinaio nel quale in questo mondo ella fu posta."

There seems to be no doubt that for Italia we should read Arabia.

1. This reading, being found in several MSS., strikes one at once as being difficilior lectio in the proper sense of the term. It is very hard at first sight to see the point of it; and if Italia were the original reading, it is inconceivable that a scribe should have substituted Arabia. But, on the contrary supposition, it is obvious that Italia might be substituted for Arabia, on the grounds that the ninth day of the month was the ninth day as much in Italy as anywhere else, and that there was no need to go further afield to justify it.

2. For the same reason, to introduce Italia at all would be very weak, if there were nothing exceptional or distinctive about the manner of reckoning intended; and still more (looking only a short way ahead), there would be a very lame antithesis between (1) Italy, (2) Syria, and (3) "our usage," which could hardly be any other than that of Italy.

3. Observe, it is Dante's object to find the number nine pervading the date of Beatrice's death in respect of the day, the month, and the year. He manages to count June as the ninth month by referring to the Calendar of Syria. Apparently he finds it necessary to call in the aid of Arabian usage to make her death fall on the ninth day of the month. Now, why is this? I find in chap. i. of Alfraganus' Elementa Astronomica—a work, as I could prove, largely used by Dante for his astronomical details, especially in the Convito—the statement that the Arabians begin their day from sunset, while the Romans and others begin it from sunrise. It is to be noticed that in the very next paragraph Alfraganus enumerates the Syrian months, explaining that "Tixryn" is the first month in the year; and shortly afterwards, when comparing the Syrian and Roman months, he states that this month corresponds with October. This reveals the source of Dante's information as to a system in which June could be reckoned as the ninth month. But to return to the difficulty as to the day. It now becomes apparent to us that Beatrice really died, not, as commonly supposed, on June 9, but on the evening of June 8 according to our reckoning; and that Dante, in order to be able to call it June 9, was obliged to have recourse to the Arabian usage by which (quod Alfraganus) that day could be held to commence on the evening of June 8.

4. We seem to gain from this a strong argument for the reality of Beatrice and the historical character of the events narrated of her. Unless her death actually occurred on June 8, unless Dante were hampered by actual facts, why should he have chosen so awkward a date, and one which required such far-fetched ingenuity in order to yield the allegorical significance desired? Why should he not have said November 9, for instance, the propriety of which would need no such elaborate gloss?

We have also, one may add, an instructive illustration of the success with which allegorical meanings can be elicited from the most commonplace or unpromising facts, if only the mind be set upon it.

THE DERIVATION OF "MERSEY."

London: Nov. 16, 1894.

The name of the Mersey appears in a document of the beginning of the eleventh century in the form Marse; but this is an oblique case, the nominative being probably Meres. The present name seems to be compounded with ea "river." The prehistoric form from which Meres would normally descend is Marusi or Marusia. Can this be a British feminine participle, used adjectivally in the sense "dead"? The designation "dead" might have been applied to the waters of the estuary, with reference to their comparative stillness, as opposed to the open sea. I do not know whether this participial formation has been traced in Celtic, though it is found in most of the other branches of the Indo-European family. Perhaps a corrupted form of marusia may exist in Morimarusa (translated "dead sea" by Pliny), the name of the Northern Ocean; the difficulty of supposing mori to have been feminine seems to be involved in any possible explanation of the name.* An objection that may be made to my suggestion with regard to the name of the Mersey, is that the s between vowels might be expected to have disappeared before the English became acquainted with the name; but perhaps the chronology of this change in various parts of Britain is not well enough known for the objection to be regarded as fatal.

HENRY BRADLEY.

THE HIND WITH THE GOLDEN HORNS.

Ulm, Germany: Nov. 20, 1894.

The blunder mentioned by Aristotle, as made by some poets, who did not know that female deer have no horns—referred to by Prof. Ridgeway in his interesting discussion of the legend of Hercules and the Hind with the Golden Horns (ACADEMY, November 17, p. 404)—is still to be met with in many learned commentaries on the Psalms. On occasion of the difficult inscription of Psalm xxii. (xxi.) Aijeleth hash-Shahar—i.e., The Hind of the Morning—commentators used to say that this is to be understood of the Aurora, the first rays of which, to quote (instar omnium) "the words of Franz Delitzsch" (3rd ed., vol. i., p. 217), "are compared with the horns of a hind." The English translation of his Commentary is not at my disposition, but I trust that the translator knew so much natural history as to correct this traditional blunder. But the question is very interesting; whether there be not some connexion between this Semitic expression and the Greek conception of a hind with golden horns.

May I be permitted to add one more note to another part of the report of Prof. Ridgeway's paper. On p. 404 it is said that "occasional" pieces of reindeer horns have been found in the "lake dwellings of Switzerland and Bavaria." The chief place of these finds in Germany is not here mentioned. In Wurtemberg, near the spring of the Schussen, a little river flowing to the Lake of Constance, some twenty kilometres from the nearest point of the Danube or Ister, the shady sources of which Hercules is said to have reached in his journey in search of the golden-horned hind, quite a surprising mass of reindeer horns have come to light.

POPE'S LINES ON ADDISON.

London: Nov. 22, 1894.

In the ACADEMY for February 9, 1889, I was able to show that Pope's well-known lines on Addison, which were printed in Cythereia in 1723, had first seen the light in a somewhat different form in the St. James's Journal for December 15, 1722. Correspondence on the subject appeared in the subsequent numbers of the ACADEMY; and one writer suggested that the question of priority of publication was not settled conclusively, because the book called Cythereia might be post-dated, and have appeared actually before the newspaper. I could not at the time ascertain the exact date upon which Cythereia was issued; but I am now able to settle the matter by a reference to the second number of John Wilford's Monthly Catalogue, from which it seems that it was in April, 1723, that Curll published "Cythereia; or, New Poems upon Love and Intrigue (none of which were ever before published)." One of the pieces mentioned in this notice of the book was a "Satire upon Mr. Addison by Mr. Pope." The version in the St. James's Journal was, therefore, the first by about four months.

"THE BEST PLAYS OF BEN JONSON."

London: Nov. 29, 1894.

In reply to Prof. Herford's letter in the current number of the ACADEMY, I beg to say: (1) That the paragraph referred to by him does not connect his name with the second volume of "The Best Plays of Ben Jonson," but only with the first volume, which appeared under his editorship.

(2) When the graphist called the second volume of "The Best Plays of Ben Jonson" the last number of the "Mermaid Series" he meant merely that it was the most recent number.

(3) A third volume of "The Best Plays of Ben Jonson" is now in the press, and contains those plays which Prof. Herford considers essential in such a selection.

I may add that neither on the title-page of the second and third volumes of "The Best Plays of Ben Jonson," nor in any advertisement, has Prof. Herford been described as the editor.

"LONGANIMITY."

Manchester: Nov. 25, 1894.

I observe that, in the last number of the ACADEMY, Mr. Morfill, in noticing Mme. Ragozin's English translation of Leroy-Beaulieu's Empire of the Tears, appears to take exception to the word "longanimity" as an "Americanism."

The use of the word is, however, familiar enough to English Catholics. It occurs in the well-known list of the "fruits of the Spirit" in the Douay Version of Galatians v. 22, whence it has passed into familiar use in our Catechisms, and is learned in this form by all our school-children. It may not be a very pleasing word; but to us, who are so much accustomed to it, it certainly does not seem any less euphonious than "magnanimity."

SCIENCE.

Sir Victor Brooke, Sportsman and Naturalist.
By O. Leslie Stephen. (John Murray.)

SIR VICTOR BROOKE was a typical, large-hearted man, and, as such, well worthy of having his life commemorated. Whatever he found worth doing, he did it with his might, never grudging pains or trouble. As sportsman, athlete, traveller, naturalist, he was eminent among the multitudes of the Anglo-Saxon race who are devoted to these pursuits. But there were still better traits in his character. His faith was firm, patient, unassuming. His Irish estates demanded sympathetic aid, kindness, philanthropy, and never appealed to him in vain. As for his inner and home life, no stranger can speak of its beauty, but can only be thankful to Mr. O. Leslie Stephen for the modest, reticent delineation of these features, which must be almost sacred in the eyes of friends. The rest of the book is a model of what such a biography should be. After a brief memoir, Sir V. Brooke is left, as much as may be, to himself. His letters and journals abound in interesting scenes and hair-breadth escapes. Like other great sportsmen, such as St. John and Sir S. Baker, he never shot for the mere lust of shooting. He was thoroughly enamoured of the curious habits and strange instincts of the birds and beasts he went out to shoot; and when he drew the trigger, if it was not to obtain food or relieve villages tyrannised over by a man-eater, it was for the sake of study and preservation of the horns or skin of his quarry.

A chance meeting with Sir W. H. Flower determined him to take up natural history in earnest, especially the families of oxen and antelopes. With characteristic ardour he obtained specimens and information from all sides. Not having gone through any university career, systematic study of this kind was new to him. Soon he found himself in difficulties from want of knowledge of the languages in which many scientific descriptions were enshrined. Nothing daunted, he set to work and made himself master of French, German, and Italian. For about ten years he devoted himself ardently to the study of comparative physiology. Sir W. Flower, in a chapter which summarises Sir Victor Brooke's writings, shows that he contributed some twenty papers on natural history to the Proceedings of the Zoological Society and similar publications. Then shadows fell upon his industrious life. Lady Brooke's health compelled him to live at Pau, and after 1880 he was able to do little more for exact science. In 1891 he broke a bloodvessel, and was obliged himself to seek repose and health at Pau. There, "on the 23rd November," says Mr. O. L. Stephen, "the bright, enthusiastic nature passed away. How happy for him that the wife he loved so tenderly should have been there to hold his hand to the last."

An excellent chapter tells of Sir Victor Brooke's adventures in Norway, at a time when that country was not known as it now is. Mountain climbing was his passion; and there is an amusing account of his hurriedly ascending Sæehætten for the first time that year, in order to be beforehand with three wiry Dutchmen who were about to essay the feat. Few more thrilling accounts of ascending a mountain have ever been written, even by Mr. Whympere, than Sir Victor's attempt on the almost perpendicular sides of the Virgin Peak of the Vaugacullen, the highest peak in the Lofodens. Amid the multitude of books on tiger-shooting, his Indian journals are written with vivacity, and are full of narrow escapes, as when he killed a monster elephant, whose solitary tusk was 8 feet long, and weighed 90 pounds. Chapters on moufflon-hunting in Sardinia, and on pursuing izards, bears, and bouquetin in the Pyrenees, show the same readiness of resource, and possess that enviable quality of representing the landscape and habits of the wild creatures, so that the stay-at-home reader can vividly realise each event. During his visit to America, acute and abounding with interest as his remarks are, there are half-unconscious symptoms of the end, clouding his lightness of heart and bodily activity. The letters to his wife from Palestine, and his journals, some of which are here printed, will form the most striking parts of this book to many readers. The manner in which he was affected by the sacred associations of the country, and the deep pleasure with which he threw himself into the spiritual meaning of all he saw, bring out the thoughtful side of Sir Victor Brooke's character. It is impossible to peruse these touching pages without being moved with sympathy for the ardent nature which was itself stirred to the very depths of its fine perceptions. Writing from Jerusalem, he says: "Much as I looked forward and expected, as you know, I have reaped a harvest of intense gain that far outstrips my keenest expectations."

So we close this record of a noble life, which shows that "The wisest, happiest of our kind are they

That ever walk content with nature's way."

The book leaves fragrant memories behind it, and will be taken up again and again.

Needless to say, in all that relates to thick paper, beautiful illustrations, and clear print, this volume is in every respect worthy of the house of Murray.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE SO-CALLED HITITE INSCRIPTIONS.

The University, Marburg.

In the Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft (vol. xlviii., pp. 235-352) I have published the first part of a treatise on the so-called "Hittite" inscriptions. I have endeavoured to show that there is no real justification for the use of this term, and have proposed (for certain reasons there enumerated) to call the inscriptions in question by the provisional name of "Cilician." The results of my work may be briefly summarised as follows: (1) The system of writing used in these inscriptions closely resembles the Egyptian system. (2) The meaning of a certain number of signs, representing words or grammatical terminations, has been determined. (3) The inscriptions date from about 1000 to 550 [600] B.C., which is approximately the date assigned to them by such authorities as Ramsay, Hogarth, and Puchstein. (4) With the help of certain signs or groups of signs, which I believe to represent proper names—Hamath, Karkemish, Gurgum [?], Cilicia, Tarsus, TARBIBIASH-SHE-mē, commonly called Tarkundemos, and a title (Syennesis), I attempted to read several portions. In the ACADEMY of October 6 my essay was reviewed by Prof. Sayce, who pronounced it a failure. But since his remarks are liable to mislead the reader as to what I have maintained, it appears to me that I may venture to offer some explanations.

Prof. Sayce endeavours to discredit my decipherment by stating that I have trusted too much to the published texts, but he does not point out a single case in which I have based an interpretation upon a false reading. Nor does he appear to have noticed that on p. 259 of my treatise I have given a long list of squeezes and casts which I procured for myself because the published texts did not seem to be sufficiently trustworthy. Against my interpretation of a certain sign (which I explain as "land," while he explains it as "god") he urges that Prof. Ramsay—for whom, it is needless to say, I feel the greatest respect—"has stated that no one who has seen the monument of Fraktin can reasonably doubt that I [viz., Prof. Sayce] am right." But the probability of this view depends entirely upon the assumption that the monument of Fraktin represents a sacrifice being offered to two gods; and Prof. Sayce has omitted to state that, on pp. 299 sq., I have attempted to show that such an assumption is by no means necessary. He also ignores the fact that, if the sign in question stands for "god" in the inscription of Fraktin, the same meaning cannot belong to another sign in the inscriptions of Boghazköi—a sign which is similar to the former (but, as I have several times remarked, not identical with it), and which Prof. Sayce, with some reason, believes to represent "god." He moreover asserts that, in determining the dates of the inscriptions, I have "not taken into consideration the possibility of local differences in art or in the individual artist." Yet, as a matter of fact, I have clearly and repeatedly admitted that on account of this very possibility my dates are approximate only, my confidence in their general correctness being due to the convergence of two independent lines of proof, &c., &c.

Such are some of Prof. Sayce's objections. As to others, the reader may judge by the following example. In inscriptions from Hamath I believed that I had discovered a group of characters forming part of a royal title, and signifying "Hamath"; in inscriptions from Jerabis (which is generally admitted to be in the territory of the ancient Karkemish), a group signifying "Karkemish"; in inscriptions from Mar'ash (which is generally admitted to correspond to the ancient Markash, the capital of Gurgum), a group signifying "Gurgum," or, perhaps, "Markash"; in inscriptions which, according to my decipherments, were set up by kings of Cilicia, a group signifying "Tarsus," a sign for "Cilicia," and a group representing the royal title, "Syennesis." These readings mutually confirm one another to such an extent that they must be regarded as justifying my conclusions, unless some irrefutable argument can be urged on the other side. What argument does Prof. Sayce bring forward? There is no reason, he says, to suppose that the name "Hamath" occurs in inscriptions from Hamath, because he "believes" that the king of Hamath was a conqueror. Again, in inscriptions from Jerabis we cannot, according to him, be sure of having discovered such a name as Karkemish, because we are not "absolutely certain" that Jerabis is on the site of the ancient Karkemish. But of this I do not pretend to be "absolutely certain" (see pp. 315 sq. of my treatise), while Prof. Sayce has himself put it forward in an article on the Hittites, published not long ago, as a matter beyond dispute. Nor has he noticed that the question is here irrelevant, since the point on which I have insisted is that Jerabis lies in the territory of Karkemish, as Prof. Sayce would probably even now admit to be the case. Against my theory that a group of characters signifying "Gurgum" (the capital of which was Markash) occurs in an inscription from Mar'ash, Prof. Sayce urges that the identity of Mar'ash and Markash is "merely a probable conjecture." Yet, when it suits his purpose, he has no difficulty about accepting as unquestionable an identification which possesses precisely the same degree of certainty—namely, that of Malatiye with Meliddu. Moreover, in this case also he forgets that his objection misses the real point, since the reading "Gurgum" appears to me preferable to the reading "Markash," and Prof. Sayce will scarcely venture to deny that Mar'ash is situated in the territory of the ancient Gurgum. Moreover, he completely ignores the fact that, assuming my decipherment to be correct, I have made out among the titles of kings mentioned in later inscriptions the graphical expressions for "king of Tarsus," "king of Cilicia," and "Syennesis" (which, according to very many scholars, was the title of the Cilician kings). Nor does Prof. Sayce mention (1) that the groups of signs which I have explained as representing the aforesaid names mutually confirm one another in the clearest manner; (2) that even if I had wrongly explained certain groups my readings might still be correct, since some phonetic values have been derived by me from several groups at once; (3) that my interpretation of a certain group as signifying "Karkemish" is strongly supported by the fact that the group in question contains, in the proper place, a sign which Prof. Sayce himself had explained (rightly, no doubt, though on erroneous grounds) as representing me (mi).

The above examples give a fair idea of Prof. Sayce's criticisms. That I have not been able to answer all his objections is due merely to want of space. As I have no reason to suspect him of any personal ill-will, I am forced to conclude that he has contented himself with glancing rapidly through my article instead of studying it with the attention that a product of eighteen months' research might perhaps claim. That Prof. Sayce, who is regarded in some circles as the decipherer of the Hittite inscriptions, would not gladly accept my results was only to be expected; but I might have ventured to hope that he would judge me worthy of a less superficial criticism. Yet my work has not been in vain. Prof. Sayce, who but a short time ago would not admit that there was any doubt as to the accuracy of his decipherments, now declares that my attempt is "but a further proof of the hopelessness of the task" of reading the texts—that is to say, a proof that his own readings also must be given up. How is it that he has come to this conclusion just after the appearance of my work? So far as I am able to see (though others may perhaps know more about it), only one answer can be given. Prof. Sayce seems to have a higher opinion of my decipherments than he is willing to confess, even to himself, and he accordingly plays a double game—while attacking me, he manages to cover his own retreat. If a writer, who has, at all events, occupied himself more than most others with the so-called Hittite texts, had none but vague arguments to bring forward against my work; if, in order to refute me, he has been obliged to abandon his former views and to deny what the great majority of scholars believe to be certain, it appears to me that my results must be somewhat more solid than Prof. Sayce has admitted. So far, I have reason to be grateful to him for his criticism, and I can only hope that when the second part of my work is published there will be nothing more serious to urge against it.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE anniversary meeting of the Royal Society, at which the medals are distributed, was to be held on the afternoon of Friday, being St. Andrew's Day. The annual dinner of the members and their friends was to take place the same evening.

At the meeting of the Statistical Society held last week, a Guy gold medal was presented to Dr. Robert Giffen, in recognition of his long and exceptional services to statistical science.

A SPECIAL meeting of the Statistical Society will be held in the Lecture Theatre of the Museum of Practical Geology, 28, Jermyn-street, on Tuesday next, at 4.15 p.m., when a paper on "The Eleventh United States Census" will be read by the Hon. Robert P. Porter, superintendent, and an exhibition of the Hollerith Electrical Counting Machine will be given by Dr. Herman Hollerith, of Washington.

THE Drapers' Company has contributed £20 to the funds of the Epping Forest Museum, which is being formed by the Essex Field Club in Queen Elizabeth's Lodge, Chingford, with the object of illustrating the natural history, antiquities, and scenery of the district.

MESSRS. W. H. ALLEN & Co. announce that a further volume of their "Naturalist's Library" will be issued on Monday next, being Butterflies, vol. i., with special reference to British species, by Mr. W. F. Kirby. The fifth volume of the series has been delayed, owing to the necessity of several extra printings in some of the numerous coloured plates.

MISS ORMEROD will issue in a few days an abstract of information on the history and habits of a destructive cattle-pest, the Warble or Ox Bot Fly. The pamphlet will be fully illustrated, and will contain an epitome of the knowledge and experience gained up to the present time, and especially during the years 1884 to 1894. It will deal practically with means of prevention and remedy. The publishers are Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall & Co.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

At the meeting of the Philological Society, to be held at University College, Gower-street, on Friday next, at 8 p.m., Dr. A. N. Jannaris, of Athens, will read a paper, entitled "The Anglo-German and the Traditional Pronunciations of Ancient Greek, Examined by the Light of Inscriptions and Papyri."

At the meeting of the Victoria Institute, to be held at 8, Adelphi-terrace, on Monday next, at 4.30 p.m., Mr. Theo. G. Pinches, of the British Museum, will read a paper on "Semitic Languages."

WE have to record the death of the Rev. Solomon Caesar Malan, D.D., which took place at Bournemouth on November 25, in the eighty-third year of his age. The son of a Genevese pasteur, Dr. Malan graduated at Oxford in the same year as Dean Stanley, after gaining both the Sanskrit and the Hebrew scholarships. For forty years (1845 to 1885) he was vicar of Broad-windsor, in Dorsetshire. But he derives his title to remembrance from his extraordinary linguistic attainments, which rivalled those of Mezzofanti. He was at home in Coptic and Aethiopic, Armenian and Georgian, Chinese and Japanese. His valuable library is now in the Indian Institute at Oxford, while he presented to the Bodleian a Psalm written in no less than eighty languages or dialects. He was also no mean draughtsman, and an enthusiastic ornithologist.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

PHILOLOGICAL.—(Friday, Nov. 2.)

DR. J. PRILE, Master of Christ's College, Cambridge, president, in the chair at first, then Mr. Henry Bradley, vice-president.—Mr. Israel Gollancz read a paper on "Puzzling Words and Passages in the Alliterative Poema: Patience, Cleanness, and Gawain, and the Grene Knyght," edited by the late Dr. Richard Morris for the Early English Text Society. Mr. Gollancz provided his hearers with lithograph copies of the sixty-six lines and passages he emended or explained: e.g., strothe vande "athrath-margin"; merewyff "syren"; nyen "nothing"; Fr. nison, Lat. ne ipse unus; feler, "better, dearer"; hadet, "beheaded"; swete, "suit"; "a lof calde" should be "al of Calde"; lers should be lerus, not "faces," but "shanks, loins," lere "thigh"; to his med "to its middle"; welawynnyly, "very pleasantly"; autly = awely, "awkwardly"; skylly skynalde = skil skailed, "a distribution dispersed"; jumpred = juperd, "jeopardy"; "the deucl haf he roght," "the devil a bit he cared"; "bi the haspede" should be "bi the [hers] haspede"; sloberande = slomberande, "alumbering"; "thagh he be stape fole" = "though ye be very foolish," staps = stapen, i.e., "advanced"; "Pacience is a poynt" should be "Patience is a noble point"; Mergot = Margot = Magot = Magog; quoyntyse = Quoyntyse, i.e., "Wisdom" = Christ; caraldes = Körolde, "caska"; veche bekyrlande the bolds = veche bskyr and bolle; pured = purf, sted; torst = "masked" (O.F. tourret); bi lag, mon = bi-lagged men, i.e., muddled men; "he . . . myght the deyl" = he[re] myght the deyl, i.e., "here might the devil"; bi it gostlych speked = spekere; alle on hives = alle ouer hives; schafted = schifted; wylneful = wyfulnes; "other-wayes on ebrv hit hat the thanes (Cleanness, 418) is a translation of Mandeville's "les juyz lap-peelnt Thanez (ou larche Noe se arresta)", "Thanez," otherwise "Thano," "Tanaon," &c. = "Chano."

(the reading of Mand. MS. R) = Kuh-i-Nuh, i.e., "Noah's Mountain" (the Persian name of "Ararat"), &c. Among other points, Mr. Gollancz called attention to the noteworthy fact that the author of "Patience" gives us a Virgilian reminiscence in ll. 132-4.

CAMBRIDGE ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY.—(Wednesday, Nov. 7.)

W. M. FAWCETT, Esq., president, in the chair.—The Rev. John Watkins, rector of Willingham, made a communication on the history of Willingham Church. After tracing the descent of the manors in the parish, and the history of the church, so far as it could be made out from contemporary documents, he proceeded to give an account of the dilapidated state of the church before the present reparation was begun. Proceeding to the history of the fabric, Mr. Watkins said that the lower part of the chancel-walls, with their moulded plinths, were of the Norman period. The Norman nave must have been of the same size as the present one, this being shown by the foundations. There was an aisle 6 ft. 6 in. wide on each side, of which the foundations had been discovered. In the thirteenth century the aisles were rebuilt double their former width, and the handsome sedilia and piscina also belong to this period. There are also remains of Early English lancets in the cloisters of the nave; and these appear not to have been disturbed when the nave arches—or at least the nave piers—were rebuilt in the fourteenth century. The history of the south aisle presented some problems which had not yet been solved. The east window dated from the sixteenth century; but this had been replaced by one of fourteenth century pattern, the design of which had been derived from fragments found in the walls. Mr. Watkins mentioned the consecration cross painted on the north pier of the chancel-arch, and gave in outline the history of the other fresco paintings, which are of three different periods.—The secretary exhibited and described a paten from Westley Waterless. He pointed out that, though it was inscribed with the date 1569 and bore the mark of a maker of that period; yet the device engraved on the inside, namely the Vernicle, was one unknown at this period, and was purely medieval in character. It was evident that both the medieval chalice and paten at Westley had been sent to a silversmith in 1569 to be altered. The chalice had been entirely remade to adapt it to the new requirements; but with regard to the paten, the smith had contented himself with trying to beat out the device which was considered superstitious. Though he had only partly succeeded in doing this, he had punched it with his own mark. Neither vessel was hall-marked. The Head of Our Lord with a nimbus, enclosed in a scroll, could still be distinctly traced. We might therefore call this a pre-Reformation paten; and if so, it is the only piece of ecclesiastical plate of that period known to exist in the county.

ARISTOTELIAN.—(Monday, Nov. 19.)

BERNARD BOSANQUET, Esq., president, in the chair.—Prof. William Wallace was elected a member.—Mr. E. C. Benecke read a paper on "The Logical Meaning of Proper Names." Logicians are divided between two opinions as to the meaning of proper names, some holding that the proper name connotes nothing (Whatcly, Mill, &c.), others that the proper name connotes more than any other kind of name (Hamilton, De Morgan, &c.). Both views present serious difficulties. The former is most generally adopted by logicians, but, in the opinion of the reader, was not correct. Two misconceptions must be guarded against—(1) The connotation of a proper name is certainly not that of the parts of which it is composed, e.g., "Gladstone" does not connote either gladness or the properties of stones; (2) The question is not whether the name was originally given to indicate properties, but whether when it has been given it has a connotation—that is, does signify any properties or not. Illustrations were adduced to show that we cannot make an intelligent use of any word, whether proper name or general term, without knowing its meaning; and this admission, it was urged, involved the conclusion that proper names have a connotation. The objections to the connotation of proper names—(1) that very different individuals may have the same name, (2) that if connotation means common attributes, there can be no connotation to the name of a class consisting of one individual, (3) that we cannot predicate a proper name—though they do not really tell against the doctrine of the connotation (for the names of different individuals, though they should be written and pronounced alike, are really different names, and that we cannot predicate a proper name is untrue), bring out clearly that it is the essence of a proper name to denote only one individual, and that this is its prime function. The consideration of a case leads to the conclusion that, if the proper name connotes anything, it must connote to each user or hearer, not only every most trivial attribute of the person or place, &c., denoted of which he (the user or hearer) is aware, but also the fact that all these belong to some one person or place, &c., and that that is the one denoted by the name. If this be admitted, the connotation of the proper name is seen to be a somewhat uncertain and varying quantity. But (1) the same is the case with that of general names also, and the postulate of logic that "every name must have the same fixed and precise meaning for everyone," is very far from being complied with in practice; and (2) the use which they make of proper names appears to show that even logicians who take the opposite view are practically not so far from taking the opinion maintained in this paper as their theories would lead one to expect.—The paper was followed by a discussion.

HELLENIC SOCIETY.—(Monday, Nov. 19.)

F. C. PENROSE, Esq., vice-president, in the chair.—Mr. Arthur J. Evans read a paper on "Primitive Pictographs and a Pre-Phoenician Script from Crete and the Peloponnese." Following up a clue obtained in Greece during the preceding year, Mr. Evans last spring explored the central and eastern parts of Crete, his researches resulting in the discovery of a whole series of objects, mostly seals of Mycenaean and earlier date, bearing witness to the existence in the island of an independent hieroglyphic system, analogous to that of the Hittites, and also of linear forms which evidently represented a syllabic script closely approaching, and in many respects identical with, that of Cyprus. These linear characters were also found on pottery and on the blocks of prehistoric buildings, and were shown to fit on to the curious signs noticed by Dr. Tsountas on some vasehandles and other objects from Mycenae and Nauplia. Of the alphabetic character of these there could now be no question. The pictorial signs were traced back to a still earlier class of Cretan seal-stones, which, from their association with XIIIth Dynasty Egyptian scarabs in Cretan tombs, and from their reproduction of certain Egyptian motives of that date, were shown to belong to the third millennium before our era. This primitive class threw an altogether new light on the Aegean culture of those early times. The owner of the seal was generally represented with objects which showed his character or profession. Among the subjects contained on these seals were spearmen, archers, owners of flocks and herds, in one case a man within a walled enclosure. The later "Mycenaean" types contained pictographs of more abbreviated and conventionalised forms. Some seemed to have been the signets of members of masons' guilds or of decorative artists; and a curious instrument on one of these, taken in connexion with the design on another Cretan gem, enabled Mr. Evans to restore a Mycenaean ceiling of the Orchomenos type. The linear forms were in turn compared with the Aegean signs found by Prof. Petrie in Egypt and Mr. Bliss at Lachish. In several cases they were traced to their pictorial origin, and in a series of instances the linear forms and their pictorial prototypes were shown to explain the shape and name of Phoenician letters. Mr. Evans alluded to fresh evidence connecting the Philistines with Crete, and suggested that they may have played an important part in diffusing Aegean culture in the Semitic lands.—A discussion followed, in which Sir H. H. Howorth, Sir John Evans, Mr. J. L. Myres, and Mr. Cecil Smith took part.

FINE ART.

THE ASHBURNHAM REMBRANDT.

READERS of the ACADEMY will no doubt have been interested by a notice which recently appeared in the Times, to the effect that the famous Ashburnham Rembrandt, entitled the "Portraits of Renier Ansoo and his Mother," has been permitted to leave the country, and has now found its home among the treasures of art which adorn the Königliche Museum at Berlin. They will also have seen letters from correspondents, who, while expressing their regret that the picture was not secured for our own National Gallery, have differed as to the title by which it has been, or should in the future be, distinguished. Thus, one writer expresses his opinion that the portraits are those of the Dutch poet Van Ansoo, and his wife, not of his mother; another, on the authority of M. Emile Michel's recently published volumes on Rembrandt, explains "that Renier Ansoo, or Ansoo (not Van) was a minister of religion, not a poet," and "that the picture is now supposed to represent not Ansoo and his wife, nor Ansoo and his mother, but the minister Ansoo exhorting a young widow." In reply, the writer of the earlier letter, referring for his authority to Bryan's Dictionary, and the Imperial Dictionary of Biography, repeats his assertion that the principal person represented was not a minister, but was Renier Van Ansoo, a Dutch poet, of Anabaptist parentage, and humorously observes that, as he could not have been twenty years of age when the portrait was taken, "it is hardly likely that he would be exercising ministerial functions by exhorting a young widow, except, possibly, with a view to matrimony."

The question is undoubtedly an interesting one, since it deals with the true ascription of one of Rembrandt's finest pictures; and as for many years I have myself been an earnest student of the great master's work, I may be permitted to give the results of my own notes upon the subject.

Among the portraits by Rembrandt entered in Smith's Catalogue Raisonné (vol. vii., No. 276) is one which, from its dimensions, its composition and accessories, as well as from its date and ownership, is evidently the Ashburnham picture. The title he gives to it is practically the same, "Renier Hanslo and his Mother." He describes him as "an eminent burgomaster," and apparently about forty years of age, but does not say that "his portly countenance" is partly concealed by beard, whiskers, and moustache. The actual age of the originals in a portrait group must always be, to some extent, a matter of conjecture; but I venture to differ so far from the conclusion of Smith as to assert that the apparent age of Hanslo is much more nearly fifty than forty, while the lady seated on his left, though somewhat pale and thin-faced, cannot have been his mother, since she is at least ten, if not fifteen years, his junior.

The picture, it must be remembered, is signed and dated 1641. In the previous year, 1640, Rembrandt executed an etching, the portrait of a bearded man seated at a table, &c. The action of the figure, the features and expression, bear so distinctive a resemblance to the portrait in the Ashburnham picture that there can be no doubt but that they represent the same person. Of the same year are also two drawings in "sangnine," both signed and dated, and certainly by Rembrandt's hand, in each of which we recognise the likeness seen in the etching and in the picture. One of these drawings, now in the possession of Baron Edmond de Rothschild, was copied by Baudran for the Gazette de Beaux-Arts in 1866, and is reproduced in the final volume of M. Eugène Dutilleul's work on Rembrandt. The other, preserved in the Print Room at the British Museum, even more closely resembles the etched portrait to which we have referred: it is in reverse, and would seem to have been used as the actual design for the etching, the principal outlines showing indentation, as if traced with the style upon the prepared copper beneath. A reproduction of this drawing is given by M. Michel in his Rembrandt. Thus, we have the representation of the same person in the Ashburnham picture, in the impression from the etched plate, and in the two drawings; and in each case, until comparatively recent years, whether the original was poet or minister, as to which authorities are still inclined to disagree, there has been no difference as to the name by which he should be designated, but by general consent each portrait has been described as that of Renier Anso.

With regard to the likeness, it is not easy to understand how the error could have originated. The portrait of the poet was taken by Govaert Flinck in or before the year 1649, when Renier left Amsterdam to reside in Italy—it was afterwards engraved by Folckema—but not only is there an entire absence of record that his likeness was ever painted by Rembrandt, there is the fact that, born in 1626, or as some authorities assert in 1622, he must have been, at the most, in his nineteenth year when the drawings above referred to and the etching were executed, while the person represented was at least forty, or, as we have assumed, more nearly fifty years of age. But is our further contention as to the correct name of the original supported by sufficient proof? We are inclined to think that the evidence is even more conclusive.

Although now, perhaps, almost forgotten, it must be acknowledged that, in his day, Cornelis Claesz, born at Amsterdam in 1592, was regarded as a person of more than ordinary reputation, held in honour among his fellow-countrymen not only as an eloquent preacher, but recognised as a leading minister in the Mennonite branch of the Reformed Church in Holland, and, what is, perhaps, of greater interest to ourselves, belonging to a family more or less intimately connected with the family of Rembrandt. In the later years of the seventeenth century, at least some time after his death in 1646, there was published in Amsterdam a series of biographical memoirs of eminent Dutch preachers. Several of these memoirs were accompanied by engraved portraits; among them a copy by Zavery, a half-length, after the Rembrandt etching of 1640, of which we have spoken, with the inscription below, "Kornelis Klaasz Anso," followed by four Dutch verses, "Siet Ansoos beeltnis, &c.," which may be translated:—

"Behold the portrait of Anso, who is inflamed with zeal to God. His heart, rejoicing in good, forsakes the delights of the world for the edification, salvation, and consolation of the members of the Church, who rely upon the aid of Him who is their shepherd."

Many years afterwards, 1743-45, appeared a further or supplemental edition of these Memoirs. Here again the chapter on Cornelis Claesz is illustrated by a portrait, this time of only the head and bust, in an oval, engraved by Philips, not, we think, after the original, but after the copy inserted in the earlier edition, and below it an inscription, "Kornelis Klaasz Anso, Die Ansoos beeld, &c.," while, in the concluding paragraph of the Memoir, certain verses are transcribed which had been composed by the poet Vondel—they may be found in the collected edition of his works—as an inscription to be placed beneath some portrait by Rembrandt of the distinguished preacher (not

"O Rembrandt, paint us the voice of Cornelis.
The visible part of this man is his least charm,
The invisible we know only by hearing—
Who would know Anso must hear him."

To this we may add that, in one of the large public collections, we have met with an early impression of Rembrandt's etching, on which, in the lower margin, printed from another plate, is an inscription, signed, on the left, by Barlaeus, possibly as a record that it was added at his suggestion, in which appear these lines from Vondel, together with the name of the original of the portrait, "Kornelis Klaesz Anso."

And yet, when we turn to Gersaint, the first writer who compiled a Descriptive Catalogue of the Etched Work of Rembrandt, we find this portrait of Cornelis inscribed "Renier Hanslo, Ministre Anabaptiste." Gersaint was no careless amateur: he had enjoyed unusual opportunities for acquainting himself with the works of the great master; he was present when, in 1702, the unrivalled collection of Jan Six, the "burgomaster" and friend of Rembrandt, had been brought into the sale-room. It can hardly be supposed that so important an etched portrait was wanting or was wrongly designated. He had ready access to the portfolios of Jacob Houbraken, into whose hands the larger part of the Six Rembrandts had passed. He was equally familiar with the collection of Willem, Six's nephew, which Messrs. Helle and Glomy record as containing a complete series of the etchings in their finest condition. It could not, therefore, have been through any carelessness on his part that the name assigned to the Cornelis in his catalogue was erroneous. He did not live to publish his manuscript, which after his death, by arrangement with his widow, was completed and printed by Helle and Glomy (1751-52). Must we not assign to them the erroneous designation rather than suppose that the mistake originated with Gersaint? The error once in print, and apparently on such authority, it is but natural that succeeding writers and cataloguers, as Daulby and Bartsch, down to Wilson in 1836, and even Charles Blanc in his first published volume (1853), should have continued it. The correction appeared in Charles Blanc's next edition, and is endorsed by recent writers upon Rembrandt, as Vosmaer and others; it can only be by oversight that the name of Renier has been restored by Michel.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE council of the Royal Academy have elected Mr. George H. Birch to the curatorship of Sir John Soane's Museum, vacant by the death of the late Mr. Wyatt Papworth. Mr. Birch was the designer of the Old London street in the Health Exhibition, and was hon. secretary for some years of the London and Middlesex Archaeological Society.

THE twenty-third winter exhibition of sketches and studies by members of the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colours will open next week, in Pall-Mall East.

THE following have been elected members of the Institute of Painters in Oil Colours: Messrs. W. A. Breakespeare, J. S. Hill, and Lance Calkin.

TO-MORROW is the third "Museum Sunday," when sermons will be preached in various places of worship in London and the provinces in support of the objects of the Sunday Society: namely, the opening of museums, art galleries, libraries, and gardens on Sundays. Among the exhibitions that will be specially thrown open to members of the Sunday Society on this day we may mention—the New Gallery, the Institute of Painters in Oil Colours, the Dulwich Gallery, the Soane Museum, and the Flaxman Gallery at University College.

MR. A. BRUCE JOY has had on view in his studio during this week statues of Mr. Oliver Heywood (of Manchester) and Mr. Whitley (of Liverpool); as well as the memorials of Prof. Adams for Westminster Abbey and of Sir Robert Montgomery for St. Paul's.

THE subject of Prof. A. H. Church's lecture at the Royal Academy on Thursday next will be "Conservation of Pictures."

WE learn from the Art Journal that the building of the gallery which Mr. Henry Tate is erecting at Westminster, to receive the pictures and sculpture presented by him to the nation as the nucleus of a Gallery of British Art, is now progressing rapidly. The foundations have all been laid, and already in places the work has been raised to about twelve feet above the pavement level. It is hoped to complete it some time in 1896. The architect, Mr. Sidney R. J. Smith, has very considerably altered his original plans: the domes and towers proposed have been omitted, the principal objection to them being that they might be likely to throw heavy shadows which would reduce the light of glass-roofed galleries.

ACCORDING to the Essex Review (London: Fisher Unwin) Lord Rookwood has presented to the Colchester Museum the contents of a bronze-founder's hoard, which was recently found on his property near Harlow. The objects include twenty-four celts, two large handles with circular rings, two perfect spear-heads and portions of others, the rim of a vessel marked with a characteristic Celtic pattern, and many lumps of rough metal from the bottom of a crucible. We may take this opportunity of saying that the Essex Review is an admirably edited quarterly, paying special attention to the local historians of the county.

THE new volume of the Studio, notwithstanding that it contains too few literary contributions by professional writers and too many by amateurish painters, is, in the execution of its general scheme, an advance even upon its predecessors; and the Studio, it may be remembered, began well. The quality of its illustrations, as well as their number, is a source of amazement to us. In one of the articles Albert Moore is splendidly illustrated, though feebly written of by Mr. Baldry, who is, presumably, an artist. Some of the designs for Ex-libris, and some of Mr. Silver's designs—"The Floral Sea" and "A Fuschia Design"—are of great beauty. Mr. Jacob Hood, in a few words of no particular significance, recommends to us the dry-point etchings of M. P. Helleu, which indeed recommend themselves better than he can recommend them. They are reproduced most successfully, and are an exquisite record of French vivacity and charm in these latter years. Some excellent original lithographs now form a special feature of the Studio, and, we may hope, will continue to do so. In one of them Mr. Anning Bell, whose work is not uniformly happy, chronicles the grace of slow movement—"Bacon's 'decent and gracious motion.'" In another, Mr. Frank Short, who would sin indeed if he confined himself altogether to his admirable reproductive engraving, presents his vision of Putney. And in a third, Mr. Whistler makes a dignified and vivacious memorandum of the aspect of one of the galleries of the Louvre. What is conspicuous throughout the Studio is its sympathy with the newer movements in the world of art.

AT a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Georges Perrot read a communication from Dr. W. Helbig, upon a Roman lamp belonging to M. Martinelli, of Rome, which bears a bas-relief of a novel character. The style of the art and the lettering of the inscriptions assign it to the beginning of the imperial period. The design shows two gladiators heavily armed, who are attacking each other; while a lanista separates them, holding a staff in his right hand, and in his left what looks like a palm. Behind each gladiator is a crown. Both are armed more or less in the style of those called Sannites or secutores, though only one of them has the characteristic curved sword (sica). Beneath the bas-relief is a titulus, containing the inscription:

SABINVS
POPILLIVS

These two names cannot belong to the gladiators; for it is altogether opposed to Roman usage to distinguish one man by his cognomen, and another by the name of his gens. Besides, the names are those of citizens, and could hardly be given to gladiators. Most probably the titulus indicates the name of the maker of the lamp: Popillius Sabinus—this inversion of the cognomen and gentile name being common as early as Cicero's time. Moreover, there exist several terra-cotta cups, bearing the name of a maker called Gaius Popilius: one of them gives also the name of the town, Merania in Umbria, where this Popilius had his workshop. These cups belong to the end of the third and the first half of the second century B.C. Is it possible that the maker of the lamp was a descendant of the maker of the cups? Behind the crown on the right is a S, and above the head of the lanista are the letters MIS, which Dr. Helbig did not attempt to explain.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

THE Wolff Musical Union seems to have been established for the purpose of making known to us chamber works by modern French composers, with which we are but imperfectly acquainted. At the first concert last Thursday week the programme included a Pianoforte Quartet in C minor and a Sonata for pianoforte and violin by M. Gabriel Fauré, a Paris organist of considerable fame, and a composer who has met with honour in his own country. There is great freshness and charm about his music. What he has to say may not be very strong or striking; but he expresses his thoughts so simply, and develops them so skilfully, that the result is highly satisfactory. Mr. Fauré never goes beyond his depth, and with him this seems to be a matter of instinct quite as much as of experience. The two works mentioned are genuine specimens of chamber music. M. Thorne played some short, showy pianoforte pieces of his own. Miss Lily Hanbury recited, with much feeling, Victor Hugo's "The Trumpeter's Betrothed"; the musical accompaniments by M. Thorne are clever, but not altogether satisfactory; Mine. Jeanne Remacle sang, with success, some graceful songs by M. Fauré.

Mr. Mauns altered the Crystal Palace programme originally fixed for last Saturday, in order to introduce several pieces by Rubinstein. This tribute paid to the memory of the Russian composer was, we imagine, no mere formal act on the part of Mr. Mauns; for during Rubinstein's lifetime a number of his works figured in the Palace programmes. He was represented on Saturday by his early "Dimitri Donskoi" Overture, by his fourth Pianoforte Concerto, successfully interpreted by Miss Adeline de Lara, also by pianoforte solos, and by two of his best songs, sung by Mr. Santley. There was no Symphony, although Rubinstein wrote several: a tacit admission, perhaps, that the composer's greatest strength did not lie in that direction. The programme included the "Eroica" Symphony and the "Die Meistersinger" Overture: the first was most appropriate to the occasion; the second, less so.

Mr. Mottl conducted another "Wagner" (will it not be wise, in future, to drop the "grand"?) concert at the Queen's Hall on Tuesday evening. The programme opened with Berlioz's sparkling "Carnaval Romain" Overture, and included the one to "Die Feen." While writing this early opera (1833), Wagner has himself told us that he was under the influence of Weber, among other composers, and the music of the Overture well supports that statement. The work has historic rather than actual interest. Liszt's Symphonic Poem "Mazeppa" was also heard; and the music forms a characteristic specimen of modern programme music. Mr. Mottl, in his conducting, is fond of strong contrasts; perhaps he gives Liszt to show off Wagner to greater advantage. The "Parsifal" Prelude was magnificently rendered, as also was the scene between Parsifal and Gurnemanz from the third act; the vocal parts were admirably sung by Herr W. Birrenkoven and Mr. H. Plunket Greene. The only unsatisfactory matter connected with the performance was the applause at the close; such solemn music ought, we think, to be followed by solemn silence. Our opinion is based on artistic, not religious reasons; but surely all who, in addition to the art impression, are directly affected by the sacred character of the words must feel with double force the incongruity of hand-clapping. The "Die Meistersinger" Overture was played with much force, although at first the conductor's reading lacked breadth. Herr Birrenkoven gave an excellent rendering of "Lohengrin's Narrative": his declamation was most impressive. He was less convincing in the "Spring Song" from "Die Walküre."

The first concert of the Society for the Cultivation of Modern Chamber Music was given at Messrs. Brinsmead's on Wednesday evening. The programme opened with a Trio for pianoforte, clarinet, and 'cello by M. Vincent d'Indy, a French musician of considerable note, composer of the "Wallenstein" Trilogy, and of the dramatic legend "Le Chant de la Cloche," which gained for him a prize at the competition of the city of Paris in 1884. We do not remember to have seen the name of M. d'Indy on an English programme. Several of his chamber works, including a pianoforte Quartet and one for strings, have, however, been performed at the Société Nationale de Musique, founded at Paris in 1871, in order to make known meritorious works of young French composers. M. Fauré, of whom we have spoken above, has also had Quartets, &c., performed there. The Chamber Music Society deserves great credit for introducing M. d'Indy's name to the London public, and also for selecting a work in which no concessions are made to popular taste. It is difficult to judge the music until one has become accustomed to the composer's peculiar rhythms and harmonies. Of the four movements, the two middle ones, Divertissement and Chant élégiaque, at present please us most. In the Chant there is nobility and tenderness. The work was performed by Messrs. G. Ernest, M. Charles Draper (clarinet), and Mr. E. Van der Straeten. The music is difficult, and the performance was not all that could be desired. It is, however, only fair to state that an apology was made for Mr. Van der Straeten, who was suffering from an attack of influenza. The programme included Dr. Parry's Partita for piano and violin, and a Quintetto by Haydn. Mr. W. Mockridge sang in an artistic manner songs by Robert Franz and other modern composers.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

MR. EBENEZER PROUT has succeeded the late Sir Robert Stewart as Professor of Music at the University of Dublin. Mr. Prout did not offer himself as candidate: his appointment was a spontaneous act on the part of the University. The new professor is no new man, but has distinguished himself in many ways. More than thirty years ago the first prize was awarded to his Quartet for strings (Op. 1), by the Society of British Musicians, and three years later a similar honour was bestowed on his pianoforte Quartet in C. Since that time he has been active as a composer; and his works include chamber music, organ concertos, cantatas, and symphonies, all of which bear testimony to his knowledge and skill. But he has not confined himself to musical composition. In a series of works on the theory of music he has not only proved himself a master of his subjects, but has attacked the contrapuntal authorities of the eighteenth century—Fuchs, Marpurg, Albrechtsberger, and others, according to whose teaching, Bach, Beethoven, and Wagner are often wrong. Mr. Prout prefers to base his system on the practice of these inspired masters rather than on antiquated rules. He is a revolutionist, but of the right sort: he is trying to ring out the false, and ring in the true. He has caught the spirit of liberality which, in every direction, is making itself felt. This war against the pedantry of the old theorists reminds one of Beethoven, who wrote under an exercise which he had prepared for his master, Albrechtsberger, that he did not think "that those high and mighty gentlemen, with their full-bottomed wigs, meeting him one day in the Elysian Fields, would look down on him with utter scorn," because he had treated dissonances in a somewhat free manner. Mr. Prout has still another qualification for the post of University Professor; since, apart from his theoretical writings, he was editor for several years of the Monthly Musical Record, after that, musical critic, first of the ACADEMY, and then of the Athenaeum, and in these various capacities displayed ability of no mean order.

THE HISTORY of the ART of BOOKBINDING.

Edited by W. SALT BRASSINGTON, F.S.A., Author of "Historic Bindings in the Bodleian Library," &c.

Illustrated with numerous Engravings and Photographic Reproductions of Ancient Bindings in Colour and Monotint.

The Author of "The History of the Art of Bookbinding" has traced the various stages of development through which the art has passed, from early Christian times down to our own day. Where possible, short biographical sketches of famous bookbinders and collectors are given, and many curious and important extracts from ancient records relating to the history of the craft and its followers are added. The present history is an entirely new work, bringing the knowledge of the history of bookbinding up to the present-day knowledge and contains much information and many illustrations which have not been published before. It is believed that this "History of Bookbinding" will be found one of the most comprehensive and interesting works on the art it describes, and will prove of great value to bibliographers and collectors; both on account of the special information it contains and the very numerous and beautiful illustrations of ancient bookbinding in colour and in monotint. The work is divided into two parts:—

PART I.—Contains an account of literature in the most ancient forms; Pre-Historic Picture Writing. The Clay Records of the Babylonians and Assyrians, The Papyrus Manuscripts of the Egyptians, and the Books in use in Classic Times in Greece and Italy.
PART II.—Contains a History of the Art of Bookbinding in Europe from Early Christian Times, fully illustrated by a Series of Engravings and Photographic Blocks. Separate Chapters are devoted to Celtic, Early English, Italian and French, English stamped and gold-tooled bindings, and modern bindings.

CHEAPER EDITION.—THE FIRST ENGLISH BOOK ON FISHING.

THE TREATYSE OF FYSSHYNGE WYTH AN ANGLE.

By DAME JULIANA BERNERS. A Facsimile Reproduction of the First Edition Printed by WYNKYN DE WORDE, at Westminster, in 1498. With an Introduction by the Rev. M. C. WATKINS.

Many years ago a reprint of this work was issued, and received a very warm welcome from collectors and "learned anglers." The price at which it was issued, however, prevented many from purchasing it who would have been glad to have possessed it. The present reprint is published with a view to bring this most interesting work within the reach of purchasers of all classes.

In handsome crown 4to, cloth, price 9s., with 36 Plates.

MONOGRAPH OF THE STALACTITES, AND STALAGMITES OF THE CLEAVES COVE, NEAR DALRY, Ayrshire.

By JOHN SMITH.

"A very carefully written and detailed account of the calcareous deposits in a typical limestone cave... The book is enriched with thirty-six plates, exhibiting a great variety of crystals, and the same accuracy of treatment which distinguishes the rest of the monography."—Academy.

In tasteful fcap. 8vo, price 2s.

THE DIVERSIONS OF AN AUTOGRAPH HUNTER.

With 2 Pages of Lithographed Facsimiles. By J. H.

"Amusing and interesting... The work, small as it is, cannot fail to be very highly prized by any one who has ever indulged in the form of diversion to which it is devoted, while other readers will find it readable and interesting in no common degree."—Scotsman.
 "This an amusing little book. The author seems to have had a wide experience as an autograph hunter, and he writes of his hobby with enthusiasm and humour."—Glasgow Herald.

Printed in tasteful style, and handsomely bound in large 8vo, size. Price 15s.

BRITISH FAMILY NAMES, THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

With Lists of Scandinavian, Frisian, Anglo-Saxon and Norman Names. By HENRY BARBER, M.D.

"Mr. Barber's work on British Family Names is the well-digested outcome of a long and laborious study of the subject, and this, be it observed, under the most accredited guidance. The extent of the author's researches may be conjectured not merely from the list of 'Books Consulted,' but further—and what after all is more to the point—from the results obtained. Eight thousand representative modern names, extracted from directories, newspapers, voting lists, and from other sources, have been traced to their origin in the remote past. Evidently compiled with care."—National Observer.

Cheaper Edition. Cloth, price 3s. 6d.

A MANUAL OF EXOTIC FERNS AND SELAGINELLA.

COMPRISING DESCRIPTIONS of over ONE THOUSAND SPECIES and VARIETIES, and upwards of SIX HUNDRED SYNONYMS; also NOTES on their HISTORY, CULTURE, and MANAGEMENT. By E. SANDFORD.

"The book is redolent of the steamy, earthy greenhouse. In battling against scale or wood-lice, in potting, in the choice of cases, and so forth, Mr. Sandford's recommendations are as full and reliable as anyone could desire."—Pall Mall Gazette.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s.

EXTRACTS from his BROTHER'S NOTE-BOOK. Made by Dr. TICKLEMORE. Edited by J. E. MAYER, M.D.

"After all that has been told us by Mr. Kipling, India has still its unknown regions and its inner ring of mystery. In this book many interesting side-lights are cast on the life of our fellow-countrymen in out-of-the-way Indian districts. Some of the stories would serve excellently as the skeletons of three-volume novels. Even the most astonishing have an unmistakable stamp of veracity."—British Weekly.

BOOKLETS BY COUNT TOLSTOI.

In small 12mo, cloth, with Embossed Design on Cover, each volume containing Two Stories by COUNT TOLSTOI and Two Drawings by H. R. Millar. New Editions, Revised.

Volume I. contains—WHERE LOVE IS, THERE GOD IS ALSO. THE GODSON.

Volume II. contains—WHAT MEN LIVE BY. WHAT SHALL IT PROFIT A MAN?

Volume III. contains—THE TWO PILGRIMS. IF YOU NEGLECT THE FIRE, YOU DON'T PUT IT OUT.

In reviewing the second volume, the Daily Chronicle observes:—"These stories, if we may say so, remind us more of the Gospel parables than any other kind of literature; they have the same directness and simplicity, the same human interest, the same unerring instinct, piercing down into man's inmost moral being."

NEW BOOK BY A. K. H. B.

ST. ANDREWS AND ELSEWHERE.

Glimpses of Some Gone and of Things Left.

By A. K. H. BOYD, D.D., LL.D.,

First Minister of St. Andrews; Author of "Recreations of a Country Parson," "Twenty-five Years of St. Andrews," &c. 8vo, 15s.

. This Volume continues and supplements the Author's "Twenty-five Years of St. Andrews." A great part of the matter has never appeared in any periodical, and large additions have been made to the chapters which have been already published in LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE and BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

MEMORIALS of ST. JAMES'S PALACE. By EDGAR SHEPPARD, M.A., Sub-Dean of H.M. Chapels Royal, Honorary Chaplain to the Queen and H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge. With 41 Full-page Plates (8 Photo-Intaglios), and 32 Illustrations in the Text. 2 vols., 8vo, 36s. net.

PROBLEMS of the FAR EAST. JAPAN—KOREA—CHINA. By the Hon. GEORGE N. CURZON, M.P., Fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford, Author of "Russia in Central Asia," and "Persia." Third Edition. With 2 Maps, 21 Full-page Illustrations, and 29 Illustrations in the Text. 8vo, 21s.

"This work possesses in a pre-eminent degree the merit of seasonableness. . . . But, while Mr. Curzon's book will be eagerly welcomed because it appears at a most opportune moment, it will be appreciated, we need hardly say, for many qualities of a rarer and more enduring kind."—Times.

INDIAN POLITY: a View of the System of Administration in India.

By General Sir GEORGE CHESNEY, K.C.B., M.P., Colonel Commandant Royal Engineers. With Map, showing all the Administrative Divisions of British India. Third Edition. 8vo, 21s.

WHERE THREE EMPIRES MEET: a Narrative of Recent Travel in Kashmir, Western Tibet, Baltistan, Ladak, Gilgit, and the adjoining Countries. By E. F. KNIGHT. New and Cheaper Edition. With a Map and 54 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

THE OUTDOOR WORLD SERIES.

BUTTERFLIES and MOTHS (BRITISH). By W. FURNEAUX, F.R.G.S., Author of "The Outdoor World; or, Young Collector's Handbook." With 12 Coloured Plates, and 241 Illustrations in the Text. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

The VIRGIN MOTHER: Retreat Addresses on the Life of the Blessed Virgin Mary as told in the Gospels. With an appended Essay on the Virgin Birth of Our Lord. By the Right Rev. A. C. A. HALL, D.D., Bishop of Vermont. Fcap. 8vo, 4s. 6d.

LIFE HERE and HEREAFTER. Sermons preached in Ripon Cathedral and Elsewhere. By MALCOLM MACCOLL, M.A., Canon Residentiary of Ripon. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

COCK LANE and COMMON SENSE: a Series of Papers. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s. 6d. net.

CONTENTS.—Introduction—Savage Spiritualism—Ancient Spiritualism—Comparative Psychical Research—Haunted Houses—Cock Lane and Common Sense—Apparitions, Ghosts, and Hallucinations—Scrying or Crystal-gazing—The Second Sight—Ghosts before the Law—A Modern Trial for Witchcraft—Presbyterian Ghost-hunters—The Logic of Table-turning—The Ghost Theory of the Origin of Religion.

ENGLISH HISTORY IN SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS. By BEVERLY E. WARNER, M.A. With Bibliography, Chronological Tables, and Index. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A TEXT-BOOK of the HISTORY of PAINTING. By JOHN C. VAN DYKE, Professor of the History of Art in Rutgers College, U.S. With 110 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

DOREEN: the Story of a Singer. By EDNA LYALL, Author of "Donovan," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Doreen" far surpasses anything the authoress has written. In the unfolding of its narrative, the subtlety of its characterisation, and the pictorial strength of its local colouring, it is incomparably superior to "In the Golden Days," which, besides being the authoress's favourite, is generally recognised as her best book."—Independent."A charming story, sweetly told."—Aberdeen Daily Free Press."Every whit as entertaining as 'Donovan' and 'We Two'."—Daily Chronicle.

"Marriage is not a result but a process."

PHILIP and his WIFE. By MARGARET DELAND, Author of "John Ward, Preacher." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Margaret Deland is not only a thoughtful and philosophical student of life. It is not her sole gift to be able to understand character and paint it before our eyes, but she has the power of literary phrase, and her novel is one of those rare creations in our slipshod era, of a story as well written as it is interesting."—Mr. W. L. COURTNEY in the Daily Telegraph.

The MATCHMAKER. By L. B. WALFORD, Author of "Mr. Smith." "One Good Guest," &c. 3 vols., crown 8vo.

"If 'The Matchmaker' were the first and last of its author's works, it would ensure to her a lasting reputation, and place her side by side with Mr. William Black at his happiest. Each character—and there are many—is a portrait, each portrait a picture; and an introduction by Mrs. Walford is enough to make one feel oneself upon terms of lifelong intimacy with all the circle at Carnoustie Castle. . . . It is an altogether charming and clever novel."—St. James's Gazette.

[Second Edition in preparation.]

"A great deal of credit is due to the publishers of this little book for the ingenuity of its conception and carrying out, and this very quality lends its chatty and incisive papers weight. The contributors are among the leading novelists of the day.....A pleasant little production, well put together, and pleasing in the niceties of bookmaking details."—Literary World.

"Distinctly entertaining."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Exceedingly interesting."—Academy.

The new booklet by the Author of "Stephen Remark."

THE STRANGER WOMAN. (3rd Edition.)

BY

JOHN STRANGE WINTER,

Author of "Bootles' Baby," "Bootles' Children," "A Seventh Child," "A Born Soldier," &c.

In picture cover, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

"It is a capital love-story....The confusion of identities gives rise to the most unexpected situations and emotions. It is written with its author's accustomed spirit and vivacity, and is sure to please every one who reads it."—Scotsman.

AT ALL CIRCULATING LIBRARIES.

New Novel by Annie Thomas (Mrs. Pender Cudlip).

A GIRL'S FOLLY. By the Author of

"Allerton Towers," "Kate Valliant," "Denis Donne," &c. 3 vols., 18s. [Dec. 10th.]

II.

Mrs. Lovett Cameron's New Novel.

A BAD LOT. By the Author of "In a Grass Country," "Jack's Secret," "A Sister's Sin," "A Daughter's Heart," &c. 3 vols., 18s.

III.

Hawley Smart's New Novel.

A RACING RUBBER. By the Author of "Breezie Langton," "Long Odds," "Beatrice and Benedict," "The Plunger," &c. 2 vols., 12s.

"Hawley Smart's last story displays all the liveliness, geniality, and shrewdness which characterised the earliest of his literary productions....he was amply endowed with the constructive as well as the inventive faculty, untiringly industrious, and delighting in the self-set tasks, which he performed with such remarkable ability. As for 'A Racing Rubber,' it is every whit as spontaneous, bright, and entertaining as 'Breezie Langton,' 'Long Odds,' 'The Master of Rathkelly,' and is in every essential respect entitled to rank upon an equal footing with those delightful tales."—Daily Telegraph.

IV.

Alan St. Aubyn's New Novel.

A TRAGIC HONEYMOON. By the Author of "A Follow of Trinity," "The Junior Dean," "The Old Maid's Sweetheart," &c. 2 vols., 12s.

"The book is well written and interestingly sketched."—Our Home.

V.

Florence Warden's New Novel.

A PERFECT FOOL. By the Author of "The House on the Marsh," "My Child and I," "A Young Wife's Trial," &c. 2 vols., 12s.

"...is a carefully thought-out, well-constructed, and vivaciously-written story."—Daily Telegraph.

"To all those who like a mystery, and who gratefully remember 'The House on the Marsh,' let the Baron recommend 'A Perfect Fool.'"—Punch.

PETER'S WIFE. By Mrs. Hungerford, Author of "Nora Creina," "An Unsatisfactory Lover," "The Hon. Mrs. Vereker," "April's Lady," &c. 3 vols., 18s.

"Peter's Wife," like most of its predecessors, is a pleasant and readable novel. It is full of sprightly conversation, and it is a plot that is developed with not a little skill."—Standard.

"...high spirits and praiseworthy industry characterises 'Peter's Wife.'"—Academy.

VII.

Mrs. Edward Kennard's New Novel.

THE CATCH of the COUNTY. By the Author of "The Girl in the Brown Habit," "The Hunting Girl," "Just Like a Woman," "That Pretty Little Horsebreaker," &c. 3 vols., 18s.

"...A very readable story...."—Spectator.

"...have been perusing with great contentment 'The Catch of the County'....was delighted with the newest of the authoress's novels, and found the three volumes rather too short than too long. 'The Catch of the County' must have 'caught on.'"—Punch.

"Mrs. Kennard's hunting scenes are always excellent, and in 'The Catch of the County' they are well up to the mark....The characters are put through their parts with spirit, and Mrs. Kennard has good humour and 'go,' both excellent qualities for a novelist."—Standard.

Vol. I.—KEYNOTES. By GEORGE EGERTON.

"A rich, passionate temperament vibrates through every line We have met nothing so lovely in its tenderness since Mr. Kipling's 'Without Benefit of Clergy.'"—Daily Chronicle.
"The author of these able word sketches is manifestly a close observer of Nature's moods, and one, moreover, who carefully takes stock of the up-to-date thoughts that shake mankind."—Daily Telegraph.
"Not since the 'Story of an African Farm' was written has any woman delivered herself of so strong, so forcible a book."—Quora.

Vol. II.—THE DANCING FAUN. By FLORENCE FARR.

"We welcome the light and merry pen of Miss Farr as one of the delectable that has been wielded in the style of to-day. She has written the cleverest and the most cynical sensation story of the season."—Liverpool Daily Post.
"No one can deny its freshness and wit. Indeed there are things in it here and there which John Oliver Hobbes herself might have signed without loss of reputation."—Woman.
"There is a lurid power in the very unreality of the story. One does not quite understand how Lady Geraldine worked herself up to shooting her lover, but when she has done it, the description of what passes through her mind is magnificent."—Athenaeum.

[Ready.]

Vol. III.—POOR FOLK. Translated from the Russian of F. DOSTO-

EVSKY by LENA MILMAN, with a Preface by GEORGE MOORE.
"These things seem small, but in the hands of Dostoevsky they make a work of genius."—Black and White.
"One of the most pathetic things in all literature, heartrending just because its tragedy is so repressed."—Bookman.
"As to novels, the very finest I have read of late or for long is 'Poor Folk,' by Fedor Dostoevsky, translated by Miss Lena Milman."—Truth.

[Ready.]

Vol. IV.—A CHILD of the AGE. By FRANCIS ADAMS.

"The love incident is exquisite, and exquisitely told. 'Rosy' lives; her emotions stir us. One is grateful for the artistic revelation of the sweet wormwood of pain."—Saturday Review.
"There is a bloom of romance upon their story which recalls Lucy and Richard Feverel. It is rarely that a novelist is able to suffuse his story with the first rosy purity of passion as Mr. Adams has done in this book."—Realm.

"We must acknowledge that Mr. Davidson's work in this volume displays great power. There is strength and to spare."—Times.

"Mr. Davidson's new book is the best thing he has done, and to say this is to say a good deal. Here, at all events, is a poet who is never tame or dull; who, at all events, never leaves us indifferent; his verse speaks to the blood, and there are times when 'the thing becomes a trumpet.'"—Saturday Review.

LITERATURE.

Giovanni Boccaccio as Man and Author. By John Addington Symonds. (Nimmo.)

It is to be feared that Mr. Symonds's literary executors have not served his memory by this performance. That is an unguarded admiration which shovels pell-mell into the market scraps from a dead man's desk, heedless of finish, coherency, balance, or weight: it is an act beyond usage unkind towards this particular writer, who was ever so scrupulous a player upon his instrument, and wrought whatever he conceived to the utmost of his attainment. It is, indeed, difficult to understand how the book (which is no book) was made. It is almost certain that Mr. Symonds never had a hand in it, nor authorised the scissor-and-paste work it must have demanded. Considering the magnitude of Boccaccio's achievement, the figure he has made in his world and our own; considering the mere bulk or deadweight of his work, to say nothing of the school he founded in Italy, and of the extreme limits of his influence in England, France, and Germany; considering, lastly, the significance of him—that there you have a man of letters in whose hands "the thing became a trumpet," heralding a whole age of thought, taste, and emotional equipment—considering all this, and adding the force of Mr. Symonds's authority, what will you find to reward you in this book? You will find an essay of barely 100 pages, in which whole paragraphs (I had almost said chapters) are conveyed from the same author's Renaissance in Italy, sometimes verbatim and without quotation marks or reference, sometimes by way of uninspired paraphrase; an essay in which a "Note" at the end repeats word for word a paragraph on pp. 38-9 of the body; an essay which adds nothing to what its author had already said (and said better), and which is so manifestly sketchy and immature that it omits the only things former utterances lacked, the only things which could have differentiated it from them and given it any reasonable cause of existence. Take a case. On p. 91 we read: "This is not the place to discuss in detail the stories of the Decameron." Why is not a book on Boccaccio "as man and author" the place to discuss his work? The Renaissance volume on literature was not the place; the excuse held there. There is only one answer: the book, if planned by Mr. Symonds, was never finished by him. A patchwork ending was found to it, and an injury done to the name and reputation of a laborious and scholarly critic.

Let not the reader suppose, however, that there is nothing of Mr. Symonds's in the piece. Though it may very well consist simply and barely of the notes from which he distilled the remarks on Boccaccio published in his Renaissance, it is undoubtedly his writing. And as his writing was always pointed and sensitive, one is glad to get it here, even at the cost of a good deal that is vain repetition, and very much which, had he lived to complete his work, he would, doubtless, have modified. He would, I think, have modified his insistence upon the supremacy of Boccaccio as a power in his world, made out (as it is) at the expense of Petrarch, and of a greater than Petrarch. It is true that Dante had no following in Italy; but it is not therefore true that "the Italians of the Renaissance turned their backs on metaphysics, treated allegory with cynical insolence" (p. 7). In fact, the reverse is true. What of Guido Colonna, what of Pico, of Matteo Palmieri, of Benivieni, of Traversari, of Landino, and the rest of the scholars in the fifteenth century? What of the painters—of Botticelli, Mantegna, Dosso Dossi, Filippino Lippi, Piero di Cosimo, and a dozen more? Is there no allegory in the Hyperotomachia or the Circe? no allegory in the Orlando? Is there no metaphysic in the Città di Dio? none in the hymns of Benivieni or the orotund speculations of Pico? What did Gemisthos Pletho thrive on if not metaphysic? What best served to spice the revels of Lorenzo and his crew? Of Petrarch, again, it is sought to show that he had no imitators among them of the Renaissance. "What, then, was Petrarch for them but a perfect master in the art of writing compliments and veiling crude desire in artificial forms of decent verse?" This will never do: I am tempted to be oracular with Macaulay or Gifford. Out of Mr. Symonds's own mouth I could convince him. He is never very pleasant when he is discussing such delicate subjects as the contents of a man's mind, and deals here a cruel stab at Petrarch's love story. But let that pass, and let us turn to the Renaissance debt to that great singer. Were there indeed no Petrarchisti abroad? Were there no sonnetteers in the Italy of the Quattrocento? no Pulci, no Politian, no Lorenzo? Are we to say that the Vita Nuova turned the key for the innumerable

"Gl'occhi tuoi belli son le crudel dardi," or,

"Tu m'ai trafitto il cor! donde io moro, Se tu, iddea, non mi dai aiutoro," or other sugared commonplaces of gallantry which make a course of Renaissance poetry a very diet of cream tarts? It is mere forcing of a perfectly admissible point to say so. Boccaccio need fear no rival to his seat. He sits, one of three, ruling unassailably his proportioned share of empire: he has nothing to gain by the toppling over of his neighbour kings. For, as it is neatly said here, in Mr. Symonds's most antithetical vein,

"Dante takes for his province the drama of the human soul in its widest scope; Petrarch takes the heart of an individual man, himself; Boccaccio takes the complex stuff of daily life, the quicquid agunt homines of common experience. These are their several subjects. Out of them Dante creates the epic, Petrarch the lyric, Boccaccio the novel" (p. 3).

If that is true on p. 3, why seek to show it untrue on p. 7? And there is one more point of quarrel I have with Mr. Symonds: a point which needs discussion. "Everybody," he says, "can see for himself that, of these three poets, Dante was first, Petrarch second, and Boccaccio third, in force of character and quality of genius." It is just what I find difficult to see. Dante, of course, stands alone: he is simply one of the five supreme poets of the world. Homer, Sophocles, Dante, Shakspeare, Milton, if these are poets, is anyone else a poet? you may say. But between Petrarch and Boccaccio, if I mistake not, the world has not yet made up its mind. For imagination is surely of the essence: a kind of vivid second-sight, in the quick translation of which the poet stands confessed. The poet is that which he has seen; he is not only a smooth harmonist; if he have but seen common things, things (not necessarily dull) which any of us might see, then, though he envelope them in floods of splendid utterance, he is still just one of us: no star to burn apart. Now, it is because Boccaccio saw uncommon things, saw them and wrote them down with piercing candour, made out of them a wonderful, breezy, sun-washed country such as no man before him or since has ever been able to visit or relate; it is for this, rather than for the exquisitely facile and nimble prose in which he set it all before us, that I claim the second place in the triad for him. I know he was but little of a rhymer, his epics intolerable, and his ambitious lyrics—"Amorosa Visione," "Ninfa," and what not—as dull as November weather. Even the songs sprinkled over the Decameron, full of lovely abandon as they are, could never put him near Petrarch, who, with his haunting elegiac quality, stands for ever at the head of melodists. But for the tragic vision he is the nearest Italian to Dante: the only known Italian with Dante, we might really say (for of course the nameless song-writers and ballad-mongers own many a great tragic genius), who shows what we, countrymen of Chaucer, Webster, and Coleridge, call imagination. Nowhere out of Dante will you find stories so terrible as that of Guiscardo, as that of Lisabetta, so woeful or so profoundly tragic; and, what is more to my purpose, nowhere in such a class of piece will you find the crowning horror so intimately realised, or brought so detestably (yet with such sublimely simple art) near to your senses. Lisabetta cutting off Lorenzo's head, "con un coltello il meglio che potè," "with a knife, as well as she could"; Ghismonda, fierce to the end, with her horrible reasoned hedonism, bowing over the heart of Guiscardo and dripping quiet tears upon it: "Non altramente che se una fonte d'acqua nella testa avuta avesse, senza far alcun feminil romore, sopra la coppa chinatasi, piangendo cominciò a versare tante lagrime, che mirabile cosa furono a riguardare." Here are things equal to the catalogue of deeds of blood in the "Knight's Tale," or to the picture of the drowned man in the "Atheist's Tragedy." The setting of the serene ten days upon such a lurid background as plague-hit Florence is a master-stroke noticed by Mr. Symonds here (and elsewhere), but without due tribute to the artistic skill with which it is introduced. Horrible enough! But who, save a genius sufficiently high to be indifferent, would have seen the technical value (to say nothing of the moral value) of such a combination? One looks to Ophelia, mad and quivering wanton songs, or to Mantegna's "Judith" for such work. In quality of genius, therefore, in that Boccace had the imaginative and creative over against Petrarch's meditative habit, we must set him next to Dante. As to "force of character," if that is to include scope, purview of the world known to the pair of them; or if it is to include grip of essentials, tact of omission, or the aloofness of interest which is admitted to be a trait of the highest poetical genius (such as Dante's, or Shakspeare's, or Cervantes'), then again the devout lover of Avignon must give place to the grisette's audacious son. He knew his world as Chaucer, as Shakspeare, as Balzac knew theirs. His world was not Balzac's: it was not the world in our sense, any more than Dante's "Città dolente" was a city. It existed only in his imagination, plucked out by that from Naples, Florence, Bologna, what state you choose of mediaeval Italy. Its desires could never have been experienced; its morals were of its own making; its hopes, joys, regrets, ideals, centred in itself. It had a religion of its own, which may or may not have jumped with ours or our fathers': it is as far from the truth to write Boccace down a sceptic as to say he was a Puritan. He was a Pagan. Landor, who for such flashes of insight must be excused his unseemly girding at Dante and other high spirits he was at no pains to understand—Landor said prettily of him that the breviary was often hid under a bunch of cowslips. Certainly he was no priest, and too humorous for a theologian. You cannot at caprice put on the trim armour of Saint Thomas. It is just as futile to expect to flourish the standard of revolt. Boccace made a poor heresiarch with his story of the rings (told, we may be sure, with tongue in the cheek and a glance outward to see how the Bishop might be taking it), or his mockery of the marvellous which he was the first to accept, or his Goliardic gibling at fat monks and sly nuns and indecorum in abbey parlours. Whom do these freaks of his offend? No Italians, be sure; no Englishmen who have fielding to their guide or Chaucer for their resource; no sane man who sees in his neighbours matter for laughter and tears, who finds it hard to distinguish one from the other, and who has a sneaking belief that humour is on the side of the immortals. Else were Heine damned! Finally, and on the same premiss, we may hold that venture of Charles Lamb's to be a devout opinion and apply it unhesitatingly to Boccace, that you are not to bring your foot-rule of decency to measure his grotesques. His world is not ours, but his own "delightful land of faerie." His men and maids did no dishonesty and thought no evil while the tales were telling; why then should we? If Boccace had been a pornographer, for certain he would have made a masterpiece in that crude fancy. It was because he was not, but, instead, a deliberate artist, that he remains healthy to be read when Catulle Mendès turns us sick, and certain other moderns, who shall be nameless here, make us ready to forswear our kind and live as cave-dwellers, with our backs to the light. There is nothing mawkish about Boccace, no unholy leer, no fingering or prying. A gust of fine animal breath blows over the pages of the Decameron, sweetening them, making them clean. They are not meat for babes, certainly, these pages: I have to learn that any great literature is. And I will not say that I am not of Landor's wish, that some twenty of the hundred stories were away. But I am very sure I would leave them unaltered, rather than risk one twig of the bays of Boccace.

MAURICE HEWLETT.

Napoleon at Home. By Frédéric Masson. (Grevel.)

THIS is a waif and stray of the literary tide which is again bringing Napoleon's figure before us. M. Masson is known in French letters as a Bonapartist of rather an extreme type, a hater of England and of the Third Republic, and a most laborious collector of Napoleonic relics. In these volumes, called Napoleon at Home, he has put together, with assiduous research, the surroundings of the Emperor in his daily life, in peace at the Tuileries, outside his usual home, the camp. The industry shown in the work is remarkable; but far too much space is devoted to the belongings of the man, and much too little to the man himself. The character of the book may be judged from the fact that eighty pages are given to Napoleon's wardrobe. If the priests of an idol have always displayed a tendency to extend their cult to its trappings, we shall only glance at the idol itself.

M. Masson dwells at length on the Court of Napoleon, but its characteristics are sufficiently known. It combined the state of the German Caesars with that of the Bourbon kings; and its gorgeous magnificence has been, perhaps, unequalled. But it had not the grandeur of old tradition; it lacked refinement and true politeness; it was without the grace and the ease of Versailles. Napoleon was not in his true sphere in it: his manner and conversation could, indeed, fascinate; but he was often brusque and even awkward in his address. His presence usually rather inspired fear:

"All those who are present are agitated, even the greatest of them, at the thought of passing under the eye of Napoleon. As said a Marshal of the Empire, 'on Sunday, in the great gallery, where we are waiting, as soon as we hear the word, "The Emperor," we all turn pale; and I am acquainted with men of known bravery who tremble in all their limbs.'"

How different is this from the Little Corporal in his camp, the centre of the adoration of his war-worn soldiers, who repeatedly "tutoyéd" him with familiar phrase.

The stiffness and isolation of the Court increased after the Austrian marriage:

"After the second marriage the intercourse at the conclusion of the family dinner was all over. . . . A succession of parades, a profusion of assemblies, etiquette made still more stringent, and the Emperor still more placed outside the common rank of existence."

M. Masson takes us to spend a day with the Emperor, and to observe him, so to speak, hour after hour. The toilet of Napoleon was not attended with the tedious and strange observances of the Old Monarchy: he had no leisure or taste for a ceremonial of the kind. He was no hero to his valet, like other great men; and he was fond, when dressing, of picking up gossip. "His curiosity was insatiable. Constant, and afterwards Marchaud, were compelled to repeat to him all the trifling talk of the town, even the doings and quarrels of valets."

The toilet was followed by the morning levée, devoted to the reception of great officers of the state and occasionally of other people of note. The conversation and bearing of Napoleon are thus described:

"No conversation takes place, which does not concern administration or politics, which touches on gallantry, or concerning arrangements for amusement; questions which often disconcert by their precision and their minuteness, and require a clear answer, a simple figure, an explanation as short as possible; a skill in examination like that of a judge, the results of which his memory records more perfectly than any registrar, an attention always awake, which nothing misses, and which travels over the Empire and over Europe. . . . There was never any familiarity; he kept to his rank. To show that the audience was finished, in most cases a sign of the head, and sometimes a glance at the list on the table, sufficed. He never gave his hand."

His manner to great ladies was not pleasing:

"He had not learned the art of talking to ladies, and was not happy in his manner to them; some got angry and answered sharply."

The déjeuner followed the morning levée. Napoleon was only a few minutes at this and all his meals.

"he ate very quickly, not over cleanly, often putting his hand in the dish and making many splashes on his clothes. . . . He masticated very imperfectly large mouthfuls in his haste to be done."

He liked at the déjeuner to see people distinguished in letters, art, and science, and was especially fond of playing with children. Those of his brother Louis were peculiar favourites; and his devotion to his son is well known.

"He took him on his knees, made him taste his reddened water, and put to his lips a little of any gravy or sauce which came to hand. Mme. de Montesquiou remonstrated. The Emperor burst out laughing—it was for his son and with his son that he had his only noisy gaiety—and the infant king laughed with him. The Empress was often present, and was amused also at these little scenes."

After the déjeuner came the long hours of work, work perhaps never compassed by any other mind. M. Masson describes these gigantic labours in detail; but we have no space to follow his pages. Napoleon worked hard from fourteen to eighteen hours a day.

"Allowing that out of the twenty-four hours he devoted three to meals, to spectacles, to women, and to diversion, which is without doubt in excess of the truth, there remains fifteen for work—eighteen, said Roederer, who knew him well; for he worked everywhere: while dining, at the ball, at the theatre."

The power Napoleon possessed to divide his mind among many subjects at the same time, and to concentrate it on each without apparent effort, was one of the most astonishing of his intellectual gifts. He could dictate, it has been said, fourteen despatches together.

"Every day, with the same ease, he opens ten, fifteen, twenty chambers: there is one for war, for each of his armies, for each of his regiments, almost for each of his companies; there is one for the Court and ceremonial, for the provincial administration, justice, public worship, bridges and roads. There is one for relations with foreign nations, as there are in the world both friendly and hostile states; there is one for each of the vessels of the fleet, one for each maritime town."

This prodigious energy continued unchanged until 1815, when it perceptibly declined.

"He said, 'I was born and created for work . . . not to handle the pickaxe. I am conscious of no limit to the work I can get through.' That is true; he was not conscious of it from 1795 to 1814. In 1815 there was a slackening. He no longer sets to work with the same energy."

Dictation, too, was but a part of this Herculean toil:

"Each of the Ministers hands in or sends in his portfolio full of papers, and each paper which the Emperor reads, or has read to him, bears its answer on the margin. It is usually short, but so conclusive and so clear that no uncertainty can arise. He passes from one sort of work to another with the same ease as from sleep to wakefulness."

The work of the study was succeeded by that of the Conseil d'Etat, and here Napoleon showed at his best as a man of peace. All contemporaries agree that in the Conseil d'Etat deliberation and speech were free; but the superiority of Napoleon was easily manifest.

"'I was present,' said one of them, 'at sittings of the Council of State in which the Emperor presided for seven consecutive hours. His stimulating influence, the prodigious penetration of his analytical mind, the clearness with which he summed up the most complicated questions, the care he took not only to suffer but to provoke contradiction, the art of increasing devotion to him by a familiarity which possessed the knack of behaving towards his inferiors as though they were his equals, produced an enthusiasm equal to that which he exercised over the army. Men exhausted themselves with work, as they did on the field of battle. All those who came near him fell under the influence of voluntary submission. There is no imputation more calumnious than that he ruled by fear; as in the case of Caesar, his power over men was the power of seductiveness.'"

The dinner hour of Napoleon was usually six: he swallowed his dinner as he gobbled up his breakfast. After this followed occasionally relaxation en famille, more often assemblies, receptions, and balls, which the Emperor, however, seldom attended. His work was resumed at the dead of night—one of the most striking proofs of his mental activity.

"It was his hour for figures, for the returns of the situations of his armies—those returns which were to him the pleasantest books of his library, and which he read with the greatest pleasure in his moments of leisure. . . . If it was a question of work of long duration—of letters to write and of plans to develop—he had his secretary awakened, and, continuing to walk up and down with his hands behind his back, dictated."

Sunday was Napoleon's day for his grand receptions of Ambassadors, Ministers of the State, and the highest officials.

"The Emperor began at his right hand to go round, talking to each in succession. He passed along twice, and twice said a few words; but in the ordinary course only remarks of no moment. 'Do you amuse yourself in Paris?' 'Have you any news from your country?' No matters of business, nothing but civilities. If he meant to strike a blow, to prove that he was not duped, or to unmask the enemy—England or Austria—which wheedled while it was waiting to get its ambuscade ready . . . he assumed his 'tempest' countenance at the entrance of the Throne Room, fastened at once on the agent with whom he was concerned, and began his discourse. This discourse was certainly violent."

This was the day, too, of his reviews in Paris; and it should be stated that he attended mass, and with a becoming demeanour.

"Without pretending to any devoutness, or without falling on his knees, he is grave, serious, and impassive. . . . This seriousness in the presence of a religious ceremony makes a contrast in the memory of people of the Old Court with the recollection of Louis XVI., whose behaviour scandalised the English travellers."

Amidst all the grandeur of his imperial state, Napoleon retained the frugality, the simplicity, and the tastes of his youth.

"That which formed the familiar surroundings of his life are contained in a few chests—we might even say in a few small boxes—and however great might be his magnificence, however much he desired to clothe his surroundings with grandeur, there remained in the Emperor much of the sous-lieutenant of former years, ready to start when the trumpet sounds to horse, and only wanting a few minutes to cord his luggage."

There is a great deal of rubbish, we must say, in this book; but it contains a few grains of real gold.

NEW NOVELS.

Round the Red Lamp. By A. Conan Doyle. (Methuen.)

Dr. Endicott's Experiment. By Adeline Sergeant. In 2 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

The Princess Royal. By Katherine Wylde. In 3 vols. (Bentley.)

Penhala: a Wayside Wizard. By Clara Lemore. In 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

The Birth of a Soul. By Mrs. Phillips. (W. H. Allen.)

A Doctor in Difficulties. By F. C. Philips. (Ward & Downey.)

NOBODY need deny "in the abstract" that good short stories may be based on medical experiences. The Diary of a Late Physician still gives us less difficulty in endorsing our fathers' judgments than Ten Thousand a Year; and only the other day, even before M. Léon Daudet gave Paris a frisson nouveau with that nice, pleasant book, Les Morticoles, a writer, whose name escapes us, had produced a collection, some of them particularly good. But we may frankly say that Dr. Conan Doyle's attempts in this way are a distinct disappointment to us. The opening tale—a very slight, but decidedly agreeable, contrast, in the half-sarcastic vein, of the old doctor and the new—promises well; but the performance of the rest does not come up to this promise, especially in the more tragic stories, though "A False Start," in the same easy key as "Behind the Times," again has merits. The fact is, that, to speak familiarly, Dr. Conan Doyle has not "got the hang of it." His imaginations are frequently good, but he does not know what to do with them. If Mérimée had written "The Case of Lady Sannox," the reader would never have forgotten it all his days; if Sheridan Le Fanu had written "Lot No. 249" the reader would have had bad dreams for at least one of his nights. As it is, the first is not much more than repulsive, and the second not much less than comic. And as Dr. Doyle has by no means stinted himself of means to produce the shudder, it is all the more unlucky that he should only produce the shrug. Of course, he may have been more successful with other readers; and it may be fully admitted that some of his stories are in themselves readable enough. They might have been fair for Dick, and good for Tom, and excellent for Harry; but they do not seem to us more than so-so for Dr. Conan Doyle.

It so happens that Miss Adeline Sergeant, a lay-woman, comes into competition with this expert in the matter of her donnée; for Dr. Endicott is a medical doctor-man, and his experiment is carried on in the case of a school-fellow's wife, on whom he tries a new treatment for cancer. Just as he has succeeded, Fate, with her usual unsportsmanlike conduct, kills the lady in a carriage accident, so that the thoroughness and durability of Endicott's cure of the incurable are likely to be disputed by sceptical brethren. The step which he takes to get the better of Fate, and the tragic complications that ensue, shall be left to readers to find out. The book is not long; and no book of Miss Sergeant's, long or short, is devoid of a considerable share of craftsmanship. One must all the more regret that she, like others of her craft, is driven to dissipate in half a dozen books the powers which, concentrated on one, would probably produce something permanent. The ideas here are by no means bad, the central incident, if a little melodramatic, cannot be said to be utterly improbable, the contrast of Stephen Endicott and Harry Crawford gives plenty of opportunity, and the loves of their children Harold and Alice are prevented from running smooth by a sufficiently dramatic expedient. But none of the characters is worked up to the point—the point which makes a person out of a mere personage; none of the incidents receives that handling which makes fiction more permanent as well as more interesting than fact. And so the book remains stuff of the circulating library, not of the library proper; a thing for stalls and boxes, not for shelves.

There is a freshness about The Princess Royal which comes rather from the style than the incidents, and which is very agreeable. Even the incidents are not commonplace; for Miss Wyld has had the courage to mix up lamp-patents with the fortunes of her Norman house, and the smell of the lamp is for once not disagreeable. For the rest, nobody, of course, can claim much freshness, in appearance at least, for a "Lady Clare" story, combined with the restoration of the fortunes of a half-ruined house, even when it is varied by lamps and the discomfiture of a bad Cambridge cousin, who unites blue blood, next-heirship, science, scheming, immorality, and, as one of the characters asserts, Jesuitism. We know it will all come right, and that is enough. But the style—not in the composition-master's sense, but in that of general faire and tone—is, as has been said, curiously fresh and lively, with an easy swim in it which never takes the trouble to lash itself into epigram, but which at the same time is never flat or tame. This is a good gift—one of the very best for the reader.

The satisfaction of him who begins Penhala and finds it Cornish—for most things Cornish are good, putting politics, religion, and the road from Launceston to Bodmin out of the question as controversial—may be a little dashed by coming before long to a Nihilist and a crime. The crime is, at least to us, generally a nuisance in novels: the Nihilist is almost invariably a bore of the most suffocating kind. These things, however, do not do so much harm as may be feared. They indeed occasion and prolong the disappearances and experiences of John Penhala, otherwise Smith, otherwise Katerfelto. But the Nihilists—for there are two, and the second Petrovsky is rather worse than the first—meet their proper doom at the hands of the Third Section, or other friends of the human race, and the crime is cleared up; and, meanwhile, there is much very tolerable business of various kinds. But why does Mrs. Lemore speak of "the gargantuan masses of the Cornish cliffs." Certainly Gargantua was a giant: and cliffs are often called gigantic. But "gigantic" and "gargantuan" are not quite interchangeable terms.

The Birth of a Soul is one of those Jewish stories which have been so frequent lately, and it is very remarkable that Jewish heroines always seem to have unpleasant relations. The unpleasantness of the relations of Alix Halfond is rendered more unpleasant still by the fact that, according to her grandfather's will, her fortune, which is considerable, goes to them if she marries a Christian. She does not want to marry a Jew, and she also does not want to lose her fortune; while it does not seem to occur to her that, as she has eight thousand a year and is quite young, a few years' spinsterhood and a little economy would put her in a position to neglect the venerable Israelite's churlish patriotism. On the contrary, it seems for a long time as though she would defy him in favour of a certain Lord Southcombe, whose wealth is enough by itself. In this case, of course, her "soul" would not have been "born," to which operation the assistance of a certain Gwynne Falkenham is, it seems, necessary. Things are put right at last by a rather prodigal exercise of that power to kill and to make alive which the lady novelist so loves to wield, the death of Southcombe, in particular, showing that Mrs. Phillips's nature is not so tolerably mild as Narcissa's, for the knot really might have been untied without killing a peer of the realm in such a very melodramatic fashion. The book is odd in more ways than one. It is written in a phraseology which, though irreproachable English for the most part, as far as grammatical tests go, reads in some indefinable way like a translation from French, owing to the mould and cast of the sentences. The sub-title calls it a "psychological study"; and though the tone and motives are quite English in some and the most obvious ways, in others they are not. Generally speaking, it gives the impression that the author would write a better book if she shook herself freer.

Mr. F. C. Philips's A Doctor in Difficulties is little more than a conte, filling but 150 very small pages of rather large print. The doctor's difficulties come not unnaturally from his marrying a young music-hall singer. The end is pathetic, and Mr. Philips's well-proved knowledge of certain sides of life is displayed to no ill advantage; but the thing is rather slight.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

NOTES AND NEWS.

THE delegates of the Clarendon Press expect to publish early in the New Year the first volume of a Local History of Phrygia, by Prof. W. M. Ramsay, of Aberdeen. The plan of the work is to treat each district and city separately, collecting all information that can be gathered from every source about each, from the earliest period when anything can be learned down to the final conquest by the Turks. The facts about the ancient religion of each district have been collected with special care; and the original texts on which every inference is based will be given in appendices to the several chapters. The early history of Christianity will be treated very fully, and the Christian inscriptions will be collected in special chapters. Vol. i. will be devoted to the Lycos valley (with the great cities of Laodiceia, Hierapolis, and Colossai), and to the extreme south-western parts of Phrygia.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish at the end of this week The Life and Letters of Dean Church, edited by his daughter, with a preface by the Dean of Christ Church. The book is divided into three parts: the first relates to Church's connexion with Oxford, while the second and third deal respectively with his career as Rector of Whatley and as Dean of St. Paul's.

DR. WADDELL's work on The Buddhism of Tibet, with its mystic cult, symbolism, mythology, and demonology, will be published by Messrs. W. H. Allen & Co. on December 10. The work contains over 200 illustrations, many of which are extremely curious. The author is one of the very few Europeans who have entered the territory of the Grand Lama and spent several years in studying Lamaism. A Lamaist temple with its fittings was purchased, and the officiating priests explained in full detail the symbolism. The priests were persuaded that Dr. Waddell was a Western incarnation of Buddha, and the fulfilment of a prophecy in their ancient writings.

THE full title of Prof. E. J. Dillon's book, which Messrs. Isbister & Co. will publish before Christmas, is The Sceptics of the Old Testament: Job, Koheleth, Agur, with a new English text of Job and Ecclesiastes.

MESSRS. GEORGE BELL & SONS will shortly add to "Bohn's Library" an edition of Smollett's novels, in four volumes, with illustrations by Cruikshank.

MR. ELKIN MATHEWS will publish, before Christmas, The Birds about Us: a series of nature studies by Dr. C. C. Abbott, an American writer of the school of Burroughs, with numerous illustrations.

MESSRS. DIOBY, LONG & Co. will publish, at the end of this week, in one volume, Dr Arabella Kenealy's new novel, Some Men are such Gentlemen.

THE new "Pseudonym" will appear next week, under the title of Cliff Days, by Brian Rosegarth. The author has made use of a novel technique, in which natural scenery is used as an emotional background.

MESSRS. HODDER BROTHERS announce for immediate publication Jonas Lie's One of Life's Slaves, translated from the Norwegian by Jessie Muir.

THE following volumes of verse are announced to be published immediately by Mr. Elliot Stock: In Leisure Time, by William S. Mavor; The King's Daughter, and other Poems, by Mathew Hunt; Dante Vignettes, by Norley Chester; and Whispers from the Throne, by Winifred A. Ivenson.

THE tenth issue of Hazell's Annual, which is to appear at the end of this week, will contain a number of new articles, dealing with such subjects as Parish Councils, the Finance Act, the Independent Labour Party, the Inter-Colonial Conference at Ottawa, the War between China and Japan. There will also be statistical articles on agriculture, banking, mining, and railways during the past year; and biographies of persons who have recently attained prominence.

A CHEAP edition of the late Bishop of Colchester's book on The Old Testament and the New Criticism is announced for immediate publication by Mr. Elliot Stock.

THE newest thing in magazines is the Chameleon, of which the first number may be expected by the end of the present week. It takes for its motto a phrase from Mr. R. L. Stevenson: "A bazaar of dangerous and smiling chances"; and among the contributors will be Mr. Oscar Wilde, Lord Alfred Douglas, Mr. Max Beerbohm, and—Mr. Lionel Johnson. The publishers are Messrs. Gay and Bird, to whom intending subscribers should address themselves promptly; for the issue is to be limited to one hundred copies.

THE forthcoming number of the North American Review (published in this country by Mr. Heinemann) will contain the following articles: "Froude," by Professor Goldwin Smith; "How the Czar's Death affects Europe," by Sergius Stepniak; and "The Salvation Army," by the Rev. Prof. C. A. Briggs.

THIS week's number of the Westminster Budget will contain an interview with Messrs. A. & C. Black, with readings showing some of the differences between the authorised and the unauthorised editions of Sir Walter Scott's novels, and also tables giving their comparative popularity.

DR. SAMUEL RAWSON GARDINER has undertaken to deliver a course of three lectures at the Royal Institution after Christmas, on "Three Periods of Seventeenth Century History: the Monarchy, the Commonwealth, the Restoration."

At the meeting of the Library Association on Monday next, at 20, Hanover-square, a paper will be read by Mr. L. S. Jast, of Peterborough, on "Classification in Public Libraries, with special reference to the Dewey Decimal System."

THE second series of lectures given by the Sunday Lecture Society begins on Sunday next, December 9, in St. George's Hall, Langham-place, at 4 p.m., when Mr. E. Neville Rolfe will lecture on "The Buried Cities of Campania." Lectures will be given subsequently by Mr. Wyke Bayliss, Prof. Marshall Ward, Prof. Vivian B. Lewes, Mr. Oswald Brown, Mr. Arthur Clayden, and Mr. James Craven.

THE Deutsche Verlags Anstalt, of Stuttgart, has just published a new novel by Prof. Georg Ebers, entitled Im Schmiedefeuer, the scene of which, as of his former novel, Die Gred, is laid in Nuremberg.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

In Convocation at Oxford next Tuesday, it will be proposed to confer the degree of D.D., "by decree of the house," upon the Very Rev. E. C. Wickham, Dean of Lincoln, and editor of Horace.

THE board of studies for the new honours school of English at Oxford have issued a set of regulations, which we may perhaps print in full next week. At present, we must be content with remarking that the examination will include the history of criticism and of style in prose and verse.

MR. J. BASS MULLINGER, of St. John's, has been appointed a university lecturer in history at Cambridge for a term of five years.

THE Rev. A. F. Winnington Ingram, head of the Oxford House, Bethnal Green, has been appointed lecturer in pastoral theology at Cambridge for the current year.

ON Wednesday of this week, Sir John Stainer, professor of music at Oxford, delivered a public lecture in the Sheldonian Theatre upon "The Choral Responses of the English Liturgy," with illustrations.

MR. ARTHUR SURRIDOE HUNT, late scholar of Queen's College, has been elected to the Craven fellowship at Oxford, which is now in the nature of an endowment for classical research abroad, tenable for two years. We may add that, since the Craven trust was remodelled in 1886, the fellowship has been awarded four times to members of Queen's.

MR. C. A. A. DU PONTET, scholar of Trinity, has been elected to the Hertford scholarship at Oxford, which his brother gained eight years ago. So far as we know, the only similar case is that of the two Nettleships, who were Hertford scholars in 1859 and 1866. During the last eight years, the Hertford has been won six times by boys from St. Paul's School. By a new statute, which has just received the approval of Congregation, the examination for the Hertford is henceforth to be held in the summer term, so that candidates who have already passed moderations may compete. One result of the change is, that there will be no examination at all in 1896.

FROM a report of the proceedings at a meeting for promoting a memorial to the late Prof. W. Robertson Smith, which is printed in a special number of the Cambridge University Reporter, we learn that the portrait of him, which used to hang in his rooms, will eventually become the property of Christ's College.

WE welcome the fourth issue of Minerva (Strassburg: Karl Trübner), which is more and more justifying its claim to the sub-title of "Jahrbuch der Gelehrten Welt." It started in 1891, as a small volume of 360 pages, confined mainly to universities proper, and accurate only for Central Europe. It has now swollen to a bulky tome of nearly 1000 pages, including all such learned institutions as libraries and observatories, and extending geographically to Manila and Monte Video. In the appendix, we notice such recent corrections as the death of Prof. Froude, and the appointment of Prof. Rieu. But there is still something to complain of in the English section: Owen's College is represented as having more students than Cambridge, and Sir Charles Russell appears as treasurer of Lincoln's Inn. There is special entry for Prüfungs-(Kandidaten-) Universitäten, confined to London, India, and Worcester (Mass.): London here takes the lead with a round number of 6000 matriculated students, while the figures for Madras have been reduced from 7907 to 3430. The second and third issues of Minerva were illustrated with portraits of Mommsen and Pasteur. The present issue—as we ventured to suggest a year ago in the ACADEMY—has an admirable likeness of Lord Kelvin, etched by Mr. Hubert Herkomer. If we may be so bold as to offer our advice again, we would submit for next year's honours the name of Prof. Mendeléef, of St. Petersburg.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

IN MEMORIAM: CHARLES THOMAS NEWTON, K.C.B.

SHAPELY as marble, strong as oak, and whole
As Earth's own heart, who sped thy faithful quest

Of her historic treasure, shall thy soul
Forsooth, world-wearied, claim eternal rest
Afar in some lone mansion of the Blest,
Where the sun loiters? Nearer be thy goal,
O pious son of Gaia! She hath pressed
On thy stern brow her deathless aureole.
Dear Earth, whom proud Apollo would expel,
Long hath outlived his perishable bay.
Abide with her and with her children dwell
Upon her homely bosom here for aye.
The mantic Mother, whom thou lovedst well, Crowns thee with golden blooms and bids thee stay.

GEORGE C. W. WARR.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Expositor for December contains the continuation of Prof. A. S. Wilkins's valuable criticism of Dr. Rendel Harris's theory respecting the Western Text of the Greek Testament. Prof. Nestle shows reason to suppose that Mark i. 1 is not properly the opening of the text, but an early title of the book (the true beginning being, "As it is written"). Prof. Beet continues his series of Biblical-theological articles; and three thoughtful semi-homiletical papers are contributed by Messrs. Denney, P. C. Simpson, and Whiteford. Dr. Marcus Doda gives, as usual, a valuable survey of recent Biblical literature.

THE Boletín of the Real Academia de la Historia for October has an admirable article by Father F. Fita on the Roman and Iberian inscriptions of Fraga. He there applies the system adopted by Hübner in his recent "Monumenta Linguae Ibericae" to the interpretation of these latter inscriptions. By a rigorous comparison with other inscriptions and coins, Latin and Iberian, on both sides of the Pyrenees, he arrives at an interpretation which, with some partial reserves, seems valid. Unfortunately, the result is simply that of the ordinary Roman sepulchral inscriptions—the personal, gentile, and patronymic names, with the conventional dedications. An incidental consequence is the proof that, in the age immediately preceding ours, both sides of the Pyrenees were inhabited by peoples speaking an Iberian tongue, with some likeness to the actual Basque. The other papers are the Will of Antonio de Herrera, the Chronicler of the Indies and of Philip II., dated 1622; a contemporary relation by F. de Guzman of the last voyage of Orellano to the Amazon, in 1545; and a list of the books and MSS. in the Cathedral of Vich in 1808.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE NEW SYRIAC CODEX OF THE GOSPELS.

Oxford: Dec. 1, 1894.

I hope I may add a few words more in completion of my letter in the ACADEMY of November 17, and in reference to the remarks of Mr. Charles and Mr. White in your last number.

Mr. Charles entirely agrees with me on one point. I said "that the genealogy (in Matt. i. 1-16) finds its only logical and possible conclusion in the new form of v. 16. This all parties will admit." Mr. Charles admits it, and adduces the fresh evidence of the Old Latin Versions in favour of my contention.

Secondly, I urged that the genealogy, in spite of its naturalistic ending, cannot be detached from the text of Matthew as a later addition, but is even presupposed by v. 18. Here Mr. Charles joins issue with me. For he argues that Matt. i. 1-17 is "an Ebionitic genealogy of Jesus," which is not "the work of the Evangelist or writer of the complete Gospel," whereas vv. 18-25 are. This spurious and heretical genealogy was, according to Mr. Charles, "wrongly prefixed by the final redactor of the Gospel, or more probably by a mere scribe," and "probably not incorporated universally in the Greek MSS. before 170 A.D."

He bases this conclusion on these grounds: (a) That "the spiritual presuppositions of i. 18-25 and of the rest of the Gospel are the same"—e.g., Old Testament prophecy is appealed to in v. 22, as often in the First Gospel, whereas it is not appealed to in vv. 1-17; (b) Justin Martyr does not refer to this genealogy, and Tatian's Diatessaron omits it.

I will take these arguments in order. Mr. Charles discredits vv. 1-17 because they contain no appeal to Old Testament prophecy, and says, "A better opportunity [of so appealing] could not have presented itself than that given at the close of this section."

This is a poor reason for rejecting the verses. The writer of Matthew's Gospel, fond as he was of appealing to prophecy, may quite well have written seventeen consecutive verses without doing so, especially when he was engaged in working out a bare pedigree. Not only so, but the conviction that the Messiah was to be born of the house of David was so ingrained in Jewish minds that to quote prophecy by way of proving it to them was here superfluous. The conviction is rather presupposed by the pedigree, and is its nerve. Every Jew admitted that the Messiah was to be of the house of David, but not every Jew that he was to be born of a virgin. Consequently Isaiah is invoked to prove the latter point by the writer of vv. 18-25, but the former was assumed by the writer of the pedigree as something self-evident.

The Gospel of Matthew was written for Jews. How then is it out of harmony with its general "spiritual presuppositions" to begin with a pedigree which proves that Jesus was a descendant of David? No Jew would have believed that Jesus was the Messiah or Christ till he saw the point proved. How else, therefore, could the author of a gospel addressed to Jews begin, than with such a pedigree as we have in vv. 1-17? The very wording of the first verse, "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, Son of David," is as eloquent as any other passage in the Gospel of the writer's wish to convert fellow-Jews to the belief that Jesus was their national Messiah. And Mr. Charles, later on in his letter, sees this, for he writes thus: "A genealogy tracing the descent of Jesus from Abraham seemed to have a special fitness in a Gospel addressed first and mainly to Jews." Exactly so. But such a genealogy was never affixed to the Gospel of Matthew, and incorporated universally in the Greek MSS., as late as 170 A.D. For by that time Christianity had long left its cradle in Judaea, and the Gentiles who had for a hundred years filled the Church did not much care whether Jesus was or was not of the seed of David and Abraham. They were more concerned with his aspect as the Divine Logos. As late as 170 A.D. they would certainly not have added such a genealogy in any text. If they accepted it, it was because they found it there and could not get rid of it. It was too primitively, too deeply-seated, a part of Matthew's Gospel to be removed. However, they did their best to neutralise its effects. For they doctored it up, or, as Mr. Charles puts it, they "deliberately corrected it towards the close of the second century." If it was not in all copies—and Mr. Charles asserts that it was not in all before 170 A.D.—why did they not simply disown it and stick to the primitive texts which were without it?

(b) Mr. Charles implies that Justin Martyr did not know of the genealogy:—

"We have," he says, "excellent external attestation [of vv. 18-25] in Justin Martyr (Ap. i. 33, Dial. c. Tryph. 78) and in Tatian's Diatessaron (ii. 1-8), where both these writers reproduce i. 18-25, but altogether omit any reference to vv. i. 1-17."

But if Justin was not familiar with verses 1-17, how did he come to write (Dial. c. Tryph. 120) as follows?

Μερίζεται γὰρ τὸ σπέρμα ἐξ Ἰακώβ, καὶ διὰ Ἰούδα καὶ Φαρίσαι Ἰησοῦ καὶ Δαυὶδ κατέρχεται.

Where Otto justly puts the note: "Coll. Matt. i. 2, 3, 6." Justin then had the genealogy.* So had Irenaeus, another second century Father, and Julius Africanus a little later.

As to Tatian, critics have long ago pointed out that his encratite and heretical leanings forbade him to give the genealogies. I would also suggest that they had rather lost their interest for the Church, which was no longer mainly Jewish. Perhaps, also, Tatian saw, what not every modern divine can see, that the two genealogies cannot be harmonised, and so had the good sense not to attempt an impossible feat.

It is true that one codex writes in the margin at v. 18: Genealogia hucusque, incipit ev. sec. mt. Still, neither that nor any other codex or ancient Version omits the genealogy. This is good proof that it was in all copies from the first. Its occurrence in the new Syriac form and in the Old Latin k is evidence of its presence long before Tatian made his Diatessaron; and not only of its presence, but of its wide geographical diffusion in East and West. Mr. Charles, in fact, would have us believe in a phenomenon unparalleled in the history of texts, for he supposes that there was at first an orthodox Matthew beginning with v. 18. To this orthodox Gospel Ebionite heretics tacked on in front seventeen heretical verses, leaving, however, intact the orthodox section (vv. 18-25). Then the orthodox, instead of simply disowning the heretical addition (vv. 1-17), adopted it in their copies "universally" as early as A.D. 170. Lastly, they tried to palliate the heretical element, so needlessly admitted into their aforesaid orthodox Gospel, by "deliberately correcting" v. 16. Who will accept such a theory of textual development?

* Justin, indeed, gives the genealogy to Mary, just as (Dial. 264a, 327a) he calls her of the tribe or stock of David. The spurious Protevangelium does the same, and Justin clearly used some apocryphal gospel which boldly appropriated Joseph's genealogy to Mary. In modifying the canonical text pious fraud never went so far, but was content with the deliberate correction of v. 16.

Nor is it a small objection to Mr. Charles's theory that it inverts the history of Christian ideas. Jesus was recognised as the Jewish Messiah before He was identified with the Logos, or Creative Word of God. As Messiah, He needed to have such a pedigree as we read in Matt. i. 1-17. This pedigree, therefore, belongs to the earliest stage of the religion. Viewed as the Logos, however, Jesus needed to be born of a mother, ἀειπαρθένος, ἀψαυστος, καὶ ἁμάρτος, as Philo says. The miraculous conception was thus an appanage of the Logos doctrine long before the birth of Jesus; of this a study of Philo will convince anyone. Hence, after the appropriation of the Logos doctrine to Jesus, the virgin birth also came to be attributed to Him.

In speaking of v. 19 as a gloss, in my letter of November 17, I hardly conveyed my meaning. I did not wish to imply that this verse was introduced in this pericope after the text as we have it had once taken shape, but only that the story was originally a bit of philosophy, a spiritual truth, which in being written down in the present shape was materialised. My explanation is confirmed by Rom. i. 3, 4, where Paul says that Jesus was born ἐκ σπέρματος Δαυὶδ κατὰ ὥρα (i.e., a son of Joseph, for it was Joseph and not Mary who, according to the Gospels, was of the house of David), but was at the same time Son of God ἐν δυνάμει κατὰ πνεῦμα ἁγιοσύνης. Mr. Badham points out that Galatians iv. 29 proves that two men might be both, in Paul's thought, born in the natural way, yet one be born according to the flesh and the other according to the Spirit.

Mr. White's suggestion—that in the Old Latin MS. k, and in the new Syriac the sentence, "he knew her not until," was omitted in order to safeguard the perpetual virginity of Mary—is the more probable, because there are external grounds for supposing that it was originally in the text. For Philo, in the same context from which I drew my citations in my letter of November 17, writes thus (De Cherubim § 12):

"But Adam knew his wife; and she conceived and bore Cain. . . . Those men, unto whose virtue the legislator hath borne witness, he doth not represent as knowing their wives (γνωρίζοντας τὰς γυναῖκας), I mean Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, and anyone of the same faith with them (καὶ εἰ τις αὐτοῖς ὁμολῶλος)."

If the parallel which, in the ACADEMY of November 17, I drew between the words of Philo which follow and Matt. 18-20, be just, the words, "he knew her not until," may perhaps be regarded as due to the same state of opinion or speculation out of which the rest of the pericope vv. 18-25 arose. Mr. White's suggestion, if correct, shows how premature it was on the part of Prof. Rendell Harris to exclaim of his new codex: "An enemy hath done this thing."

I abstain from following Mr. Charles into a discussion of the genealogy in Luke, which he also rejects as an heretical addition. I will merely remark that Irenaeus and Julius Africanus and all the other Fathers had it in their texts, and that there is not a single MS. or Version which omits it. Nor must we forget that pedigrees of Jesus so disparate and incompatible with each other, as those of Matthew and Luke, must belong to the earliest stage of the text, and have been irremovably attached to their respective Gospels long before

A.D. 170, when the canon of the New Testament was fixed. For as additions they would not have been then tolerated by people who had all four Gospels side by side in one volume.

In conclusion, I cannot see that there is the slightest ground for the excision from the text of either genealogy; and when Mr. Charles mutilates a text usually accounted sacred, he is in danger of falling into the predicament of the Chinaman who burned down his house in order to roast his pig. Machaera non stylo usus est, as Tertullian said of a famous heretic. To many, no doubt, the new and incontestably true text of Matt. i. 16 will seem to be an ill which calls for the knife; but, after all, we must abide by our evidence, and be fair to it.

FRED. C. CONYBEARE.

Cambridge: Dec. 1, 1894.

I have read with very great interest Mr. Charles's able solution of the enigma presented by the strange reading of Matt. i. 16 in the Sinaitic palimpsest, and all the more because I have arrived at a somewhat similar conclusion, though on wholly different grounds. This will be more fully explained in the introduction to my translation, which will be published in a few days.

Is it not possible that this reading of Matt. i. 16 may have been in the original draft of the Gospel of Matthew, copied verbatim from an official register kept in the Temple? Can any one suppose that a peasant woman, even though accompanied by her husband, would on the occasion of the presentation of her first-born son venture to state her supernatural experiences? The author of the First Gospel may have been quite aware of these, and yet have thought it his duty to copy the genealogy as he found it. Semitic people are not logical; and, knowing the facts, the inconsistency of v. 16 being followed by vv. 18 and 19 might not strike them. But the statement in v. 16 had to be modified when it came under the eye of foreigners, possibly when the Gospel of Matthew was translated into Greek. This may even have been done by the Evangelist himself, and yet copies of his uncorrected first edition might continue to be made or to be translated.

My conjecture is not in perfect harmony with that of Mr. Charles, who regards vv. 1-17 as a later addition prefixed to the Gospel of Matthew. But I am convinced that, on the lines indicated by one or the other, we shall arrive at the truth.

The phrases "to thee" of v. 21 and "to him" of v. 25 become of less importance, when we consider that the Syriac language is very redundant in its use of pronouns, and that our Lord was born in wedlock, Joseph being His natural protector.

I observe a statement that this Sinaitic MS. is supposed to belong to the fifth century, but I observe also that no reasons have as yet been given for this assumption. I was the first to state in February, 1892, when I discovered the MS., that its text of the Gospels could not possibly be later than the middle of the fifth century. This was a mere guess from external probabilities, without any scientific basis; and, so far as I know, even the approximate date has yet to be determined. If I were entitled to a second guess, from internal evidence I should place it considerably earlier.

So much for the MS. The version itself is considered by both the surviving transcribers to belong to the second century. Dr. Nestle has stated his opinion in the Allgemeine Zeitung for November 20 that the newly recovered text is no duplicate of the Curetonian, but the very earliest translation of the Gospels into Syriac, and that on it both the Curetonian and the Diatessaron are founded, the Diatessaron being the more ancient of these two. But on this subject we have heard different opinions; and all the available evidence is not yet before us.

AGNES S. LEWIS.

Ulm, Germany: Dec. 3, 1894.

The very interesting communication from Mr. Charles, in the ACADEMY of December 1, calls forth one or two remarks.

First [Dr. Nestle here corrects the omission of illa in the Latin rendering of the Curetonian MS., which Mr. Charles has himself corrected below].

Secondly, not only is it the case that the Irish MSS. place the initial letter of Matthew's Gospel at v. 18 instead of at v. 1—not less than eight out of the twenty-four MSS. used by Wordsworth and White begin v. 18, litteris capitalibus vel rubricatis—but two of these MSS. have here, at v. 18, the actual heading, "Incipit Evangelium secundum Matthaeum." We thus have decisive documentary evidence of what Mr. Charles has inferred on internal and external grounds.

Finally, it should be said that other scholars have previously come to the same conclusions as those now arrived at—and proved—by Mr. Charles. In their most explicit form, they were perhaps stated by H. J. Holtzmann, who wrote, in 1889, that the genealogy must have ended with the words, ἰωσήφ δὲ ἐγγέννησεν τὸν Ἰησοῦν, and that it cannot have come from the Evangelist who wrote v. 18 sq. Dies diem docet.

E. NESTLE.

Oxford: Dec. 1, 1894.

As I was away from home when I had to revise the proof of my letter printed in the ACADEMY of to-day's date, I failed to detect a slip in my Latin rendering of the Curetonian text of Matt. i. 16. On my return to-day I re-examined that text and find that I omitted the relative after illa. Hence, for illa peperit read illa quae peperit. This makes the likeness which I traced between that text and b to disappear, but does not affect my main argument.

A Concise Dictionary of the Assyrian Language (Assyrian—English—German). By W. Muss-Arnolt. (Williams and Norgate.)

ASSYRIOLOGY has just furnished a good illustration of the proverb: "It never rains but it pours." Here we have been waiting for years for a practical dictionary of the Assyrian language, so far as it has been deciphered; and all at once two such dictionaries appear simultaneously. Hardly has the first part of Prof. Delitzsch's new Wörterbuch been published, before the first part of the dictionary long ago promised from America also sees the light. Why the appearance of the latter work has been so long delayed, and why Dr. Muss-Arnolt has had to bear the whole burden of it, are explained in an introductory note.

The two dictionaries cover much the same ground, since Dr. Muss-Arnolt has chiefly confined himself to the registration of "all the important words occurring in the texts, historical and others, that are read by all beginners." The author disclaims any attempt "to embrace the whole cuneiform literature thus far published." That is a task which must be performed by individual scholars, who can supplement from their own notes the lists of words given in the dictionary. But the dictionary forms the indispensable basis upon which future work of the kind must be raised.

Although, however, the two dictionaries cover much the same ground, there is plenty of room for both. They differ from one another in plan. Delitzsch's Wörterbuch represents the work and conclusions of a single scholar, whereas Muss-Arnolt's Dictionary is primarily historical. Under each heading the views and translations of other scholars are given, with copious references to their works. The dictionary is, therefore, something more than a catalogue of Assyrian words; it is also a record of the progress of Assyriology and of the divergent ideas of its disciples.

Cross-references facilitate the use of the book. I wish only that the author had been more careful in distinguishing Assyrian from Sumerian, and both from ideographic expressions. As it is, Sumerian and Assyrian are mixed together in a way that will be confusing to the beginner and still more to the general student of language. Apart from this, however, I have nothing but words of warm welcome and admiration for Dr. Muss-Arnolt. He has produced a useful, a laborious, and an accurate work, and has achieved the object at which he aimed.

SCIENCE NOTES.

At the general monthly meeting of the Royal Institution, held last Monday, special thanks were returned to Mr. Ludwig Mond and Dr. William S. Playfair, for donations towards the fund for the promotion of experimental research at low temperatures.

THE Christmas lectures to young people, arranged by the Geographical Society, will this year be delivered by Dr. H. R. Mill. The course, entitled "Holiday Geography," will include four lectures, dealing respectively with maps as holiday companions; geographical pictures, with special reference to amateur photography; a neglected corner—the English lakes; and a geographical holiday on the edge of the Alps. The lectures will take place in the map-room of the society, and will be profusely illustrated with the lantern.

MESSRS. GINN & Co., of Boston, announce a volume, entitled Factors in Organic Evolution, being a syllabus of a course of elementary lectures delivered in Leland Stanford Junior University, California, by David Starr Jordan, president of the university.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN will publish next week a small work, entitled Elliptical Orbits: their Distinctive Mechanical Characteristics and Possible Origin, by Mr. Henry Larkin, author of "Carlyle and the Open Secret of his Life."

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

ENGLISH GOETHE SOCIETY.—(Friday, Nov. 23.)

WILLIAM IRVINE, Esq., in the chair.—Mr. W. F. Kirby read a paper on "Goethe as Faust," in which he called attention to the extraordinary poem by Dr. Kenealy, first published in an incomplete form in 1850 under the title of "Goethe," and subsequently rearranged, condensed, and completed in 1863, under the title of "A New Pantomime." The poem, though too long and, to say the least of it, utterly unconventional, contains many grand and beautiful passages; and it was also interesting because one of the metres occasionally used in it was that of "Hiawatha," which poem the original edition of Kenealy's "Goethe" antedated by some years. So far as the lecturer was aware, Kenealy was the first author who had employed this metre in English. Mr. Kirby then gave a detailed outline of the poem, which describes how Goethe, after his death, was carried off by Mephistopheles, conducted through hell, and afterwards imprisoned by the Furies for twenty-one years, after which time, in answer to the prayers of Gretchen, his first love, a poet is sent to release him, and to conduct him to the Poets' Paradise. The work, which is a dramatic epic of the "Faust" type, is divided into three acts, which Mr. Kirby called "The Trial," "The Temptation," and "The Deliverance."—A discussion followed, in which Dr. Eugene Oswald (the secretary) and Mr. Edward Maitland took part.

OBITUARY.

SIR C. T. NEWTON.

The news of Sir Charles Newton's death could not surprise his friends, who knew that his powers of body and mind had of late failed, but they must feel that it has left a great gap. From 1856 until lately his has been among the most conspicuous and characteristic figures in the ranks of English archaeologists. He has probably done more than anyone to save the study of Greek and Roman art and antiquities from neglect in this country.

Born in 1816, Newton was educated at Shrewsbury and at Christ Church, where among his friends and contemporaries were Dean Liddell, Sir Henry Acland, and John Ruskin. The bent of his talents, which might have served him well in any profession, was directed towards archaeology by his appointment to a post in the British Museum in 1840. In those days there was an undivided Department of Antiquities at the Museum, and it was possible for an assistant to gain a wider and completer training than can be obtained in the small departments of the present day. Greek sculpture and coins especially attracted him. He has told me that he regarded the study of ancient coins as the best of all introductions to archaeology.

After so good a training came appropriately years of travel and excavation. In 1852 the Foreign Office was not so fully persuaded as it now is that the encouragement of learned research was outside its province, and as an archaeologist Newton was made vice-consul at Mytilene. How he used this appointment as a vantage ground for carrying on excavations on the neighbouring coasts of Asia Minor is well known. He has himself told the story in admirable and most scholarly fashion in his Travels and Discoveries in the Levant (1865), a work which must not be confused with the more technical History of Discoveries (1862). The excavations, especially those on the site of the Mausoleum, were brilliantly successful, and enriched his nursing-mother, the British Museum, with works of the fourth century almost as much as the more easily won spoils of Lord Elgin had enriched it with fifth century sculpture. Newton had many of the best qualities of the excavator; and perhaps his greatest success lay in his persuading the English Government to aid him with money, ships, and professional assistance, so that he could work on a scale worthy of his country, without being stopped at every turn by the lack of funds and the necessity of securing immediate results.

After a brief interlude as Consul at Rome, Newton was appointed, in 1861, Keeper of Greek and Roman Antiquities at the British Museum, receiving most appropriately the task of arranging and guarding the monuments which he had drawn from the earth, and of supporting other men, such as Wood, Pullan, and Biliotti in further researches in the Levant. I can speak from personal knowledge of this part of his career. Entering the service of the Museum in 1871, I found Newton at the head of its classical branch, a dignified and most impressive figure, who possessed, in spite of a self-contained manner, a great power of stimulating the energies and directing the pursuits of all about him. Though the happiness of his life had been wrecked by the loss, in 1866, of his accomplished and much-loved wife, he was never morose. To some of us in those days the desire of Newton's approval was one of the controlling impulses of life, and the few words which we daily exchanged with him set mind and will to work. To his subordinates he was severe, but never unjust or unkind; his mere presence seemed to raise the work of the Museum, often in itself a drudgery, to a higher and worthier level. And in a higher sphere he was as thoroughly appreciated. Statesmen, especially Mr. Disraeli, trusted him unhesitatingly with large grants of money for purchase or excavation. Scholars like Dr. Liddell and Mark Pattison felt that his attainments in classical learning were quite on a level with their own, and that they had much to learn from him. In the social world his courteous manners and great powers of conversation made him universally welcome. The artists claimed him as Antiquary to the Royal Academy. The ruling powers gave him first a Companionship, and then a Knighthood of the Bath as a recognition of official services. Even Berlin bestowed on him very exceptional honour, by making him an Honorary Director of the Archaeological Institute. But to English archaeologists he was still more. When any movement was contemplated, as when the Hellenic Society was formed and the British School founded at Athens, all naturally turned to him for counsel, encouragement, and direction, and seldom turned in vain.

I have called his manner self-contained, and so it was usually in London. But those who had the good fortune to accompany him in any of his travels in the East, saw another and more genial side. Cheerful, indefatigable, establishing friendly relations with the natives, interested in everything, he was a most instructive and delightful guide and companion.

It is mainly as a leading officer of the British Museum, and as the Doyen of Hellenic studies in England, that Newton must dwell in our memories. But he was also both writer and teacher. His admirable work on his own travels I have already mentioned. Brief, scholarly, and full of knowledge, it is worthy to rank with the writings of Leake and Ross and is already a classic. Besides, he published in 1880 a volume of collected essays, papers which had appeared in the reviews, dealing mostly with the results of the excavations of men like Schliemann and Wood. It is noteworthy that every excavator and discoverer was sure to find in him a supporter, free from all jealousy and pettiness, and ready to welcome with generous praise and appreciation new light from any quarter. Thus the hearty reception accorded in England to the discoveries of Schliemann, while Germany still watched them suspiciously, was in a great degree his doing. One of the essays—that on Greek Inscriptions—is the best and in fact the only paper of the kind, and has been translated into French and German. Of the publications which it fell to Newton to edit at the British Museum, that in which he took the deepest interest was the Corpus of British Museum Inscriptions, the editing of which he retained, even after giving up the rest of his duties.

For a few years, from 1880 onwards, Sir Charles was Professor of Archaeology at University College, London. His class was large at first, but soon decreased. The fact is that he began public teaching too late in life to completely succeed. He was a polished, though somewhat laborious lecturer, but he did not find out the way to attract younger scholars by lectures as he influenced them by talk. The task of making the teaching of classical archaeology in London an important branch of classical education remains an extremely difficult problem, which possibly some man of exceptional endowments may hereafter succeed in solving.

It was the historical rather than the mythological or the artistic side of ancient monuments which interested Newton. He said of himself that he was first a historian and secondly an archaeologist. In archaeological learning he stood below many of the Germans; but, as a compensation he would never have indulged in the baseless theoretical constructions on the grounds of style in art in which some of the ablest of the German specialists seem now to spend their energies. His life is a lesson not merely in tenacity of purpose and high scholarship, but also in sobriety of judgment and strong caution in discerning between the certain and the probable, the useful and the useless. It is these qualities which the English school of archaeology will, if it is wise, adopt from him; and so secure a solid if a less rapid progress, and a reputation for good sense if not for brilliancy.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE annual distribution of prizes to students of the Royal Academy will take place at Burlington House on Monday next, at nine p.m., when Sir Frederic Leighton will deliver his usual address. The galleries containing the competition works will be open to the public on the following day, from eleven to four.

THE exhibition of mountain paintings and photographs, brought together under the auspices of the Alpine Club—which is this year to be held at the Nineteenth Century Art Gallery, Conduit-street—will open next week and remain open for a fortnight. On certain evenings, photographic lantern slides will be shown.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & Co. have now nearly ready for publication Bits of Old Chelsea, consisting of forty-one etchings by Mr. Walter B. Burgess, with descriptive letterpress by Mr. Lionel Johnson and Mr. R. Le Gallienne. Special attention has been given to the historic houses of Chelsea, such as those once inhabited by Turner, Leigh Hunt, Carlyle, Rossetti, George Eliot, Whistler, and Mme. Venturi. There is to be a limited edition of artist's proofs, printed by Mr. Frederick Goulding on Japanese vellum.

So great has been the demand for the first part of the new volume of the Magazine of Art, that a third edition has already been called for.

CAPTAIN H. G. LYONS, R.E., local honorary secretary of the Egypt Exploration Fund at Cairo, will be stationed at Korosko until the end of the year. He reports that the proposition for the survey of Nubia, or rather of the portion between Dakka and Assuan, has been passed by the Council of Ministers. Some of the engineers of the Department of Public Works have already left Cairo to commence work.

It is rumoured that Dr. Botti, of Alexandria, has been making some finds of considerable interest near Pompey's Pillar, on the site of what is surmised to be the citadel of Alexandria. This surmise is said to be confirmed by a description of the Alexandrian acropolis in the works of a late Greek rhetorician.

MR. CECIL TORR has reprinted from the Revue Archéologique (Paris: Leroux) a paper entitled "Les Navires sur les Vases du Dipylon." In this he deals, in an exhaustive manner, with the representations of Greek ships on a number of fragments of pottery which have been found since 1871 during the excavation of an ancient cemetery near Athens. To the fragments which have already been published, he adds some fifteen more of the same type, two of which (from Cnidos) are now in the British Museum. It is noteworthy that all the ships are furnished with beaks, for fighting; and that many of them have two banks of oars, though Mr. Torr does not infer that they were technically biremes. He thinks that they represent the naval art of the first half of the seventh century B.C.

THE STAGE.

THE GREEK PLAY AT CAMBRIDGE.

THERE has been an unusually long interval at Cambridge between the performances of the "Ion" and the "Iphigenia in Tauris," no less than three years having elapsed since the picturesque impersonation by Mr. Stephen Powys of the acolyte of Delphi. Up to that point each of the four great Athenian dramatists had had his turn; and Sophocles, doubly fortunate, had occupied the university stage on two occasions, with the "Ajax" and the "Oedipus Tyrannus." Some would have been glad if the committee had seen its way to select another of the delightful comedies of Aristophanes, whose "Birds" was in some respect the most enjoyable of all the Cambridge dramas, and whose "Frogs" obtained a huge success at Oxford a couple of years ago. But we are too grateful to those who organise these charming entertainments to cavil at their choice; and if Euripides was to have a second innings, they, we think, have hardly hit upon a more pleasing play than that which was produced on November 30. The difficulty connected with the chorus, alluded to by Dr. Verrall in the Introduction to his scholarly acting edition, was surmounted in a fairly satisfactory fashion, by the substitution of certain nondescript and semi-detached male singers (whose business in the Crimea was not very apparent) for the band of Greek female captives employed under Iphigenia in the service of the temple. As pointed out by the same writer, the practice of Euripides in his later dramas notoriously tended towards such a separation, as was here definitely made, between the chorus and the actors on the stage, so that the device was not without literary and historical excuse. Before leaving the introduction we must take exception to the sentence on p. viii., which would seem to limit the application of the homicidal custom of the barbarians to Greeks alone. This is surely not borne out by the statements in the drama itself, as, for example, in the speech of the Herdsman:

ναυτίλους δ' ἐφθαρμένους
θάσσειν φάραγγ' ἔφασκε τοῦ νόμου φόβῳ κλύοντας ὡς θύοιμεν ἐνθάδε ξένους.

The fact that Iphigenia speaks of a long time having gone by since the altar had been red with Greek blood also shows, if proof were wanting, that there had been victims from other regions, and of various nationalities.

The story is one of the most straightforward and intelligible ever put upon any stage. Iphigenia, miraculously preserved from the sacrifice at Aulis, has been conveyed by Artemis to the Tauric Chersonese, and there installed in charge of the goddess's own temple. To these inhospitable shores come Orestes and Pylades, on the mission ordered them by the Delphic oracle to remove the image of the Tauric Artemis to Attica, and thus to rid the former from the Furies' curse incurred by his mother's murder. They are overpowered and seized by the inhabitants of the land; and, at the command of King Thoas, are brought to Iphigenia, who, as priestess of the temple, unwillingly prepares the victims of these bloodthirsty ἀνθρωποκτόνοι for the sacrificial rite. A recognition takes place between the long-parted brother and sister; and, by an ingenious stratagem of the latter's devising, both image and priestess are safely transported (after the direct intervention of Athena) back to Greece. The contribution made by Euripides, so far as is known, to the original legend is the expiatory voyage of Orestes and Pylades in quest of the statue, with all its exciting and unexpected consequences; and the play is not hampered by any love interest, as in the famous adaptation of it by Goethe, where the passion felt by the barbarian king for the mysterious priestess still further complicates the dramatic situation.

The Cambridge management spares no pains or expense to secure a mise-en-scène at once artistic and archaeologically correct; and on this occasion Mr. W. T. Hemsley's stage-picture of "The Platform before the Temple of Artemis in the Tauric Chersonese" was worthy of the best traditions of the little theatre in Downing-street. On the right stood the temple, on the left were masses of jagged rock, and in the space between appeared a stretch of dark-blue, foam-flecked sea. The building was of rude and primitive construction, and was adorned not only with the armour, but also with the skulls, of those who had been slain in accordance with the hideous custom. This gruesome touch was scarcely justified by the line—θριγκοῖς δ' ὅπ' αὐτοῖς σκυλ' ὄρεξ' ἡρτημένα;

(unless modern Cambridge scholarship translates σκυλα after the sound thereof!) but it was undeniably effective. So were the dresses of the barbarians, which were copied, with their accoutrements, from paintings on a vase found in the Crimea.

Mr. R. Geikie's performance of the title-rôle deserves great praise. It was throughout on a high level of excellence, and on more than one occasion, notably in the scene of the ἀναγνώρισις, was surprisingly good. His graceful bearing and gestures invested the part with much charm and distinction, and his costume was beyond reproach, a perfect "dream" of saffron and white. The ceremony of the libation in honour of the supposed dead Orestes was ritualistic in the extreme, though we should have preferred the offering not to have been made in dumb show, but accompanied by the lines—

θάλλος, ὡς φθιμένη τὰδε σοὶ πέμπω· κ.τ.λ.

The long conversations with Orestes were admirably given; and, in short, Mr. Geikie, who had the main burden of the piece to sustain, achieved a marked success.

Next in merit we should place Orestes (Mr. F. Stephenson), who played a trying part with considerable judgment, and without unduly emphasising the painful quasi-epileptic seizures due to the vengeance of the Furies. The Euripidean Orestes, it must be confessed, is a poor creature, when compared with the dignified, if world-weary, sufferer of the "Eumenides." He is for giving up the attempt when he sees the forbidding aspect of the temple, but Pylades (Mr. A. W. Watson), with his φεύγειν μὲν οὐκ ἀνεκτὸν οὐδ' εἰδόμεν·

at once dispels these unmanly fears. The contrast between the nervous, shattered exile and his sane and cheerful companion was well brought out by both actors.

For elocution the palm should be awarded to the Herdsman (Mr. R. Balfour), who gave his long speech with much animation and no little humour, especially in the passage describing the effect of the appearance of the two strangers upon the θεοσεβῆς and the μάταιος, ἀνομιᾶ θρασύς respectively. On the other hand, the Messenger (Mr. H. T. G. Watkins) was exceedingly wooden, and called up painful memories of the speech-days of one's boyhood. Athena (Mr. F. Grand d'Hauteville) looked superb in her white garments, as she issued from the temple to set things straight at the close of the play. Thoas (Mr. J. P. Thompson) was engagingly naïve, but perhaps a little wanting in the dignity that pertains even to savage potentates. His barbarous subjects, when they swarmed over the rocks, suggested one of Mr. E. T. Reed's "Prehistoric Peeps" in Punch, with their uncouth antics and shaggy hair.

The chorus acquitted themselves well, and sang what was undoubtedly difficult music with great vigour and precision, though (as above mentioned) their entrances and exits were quite irrelevant to the action, and when, in Dr. Verrall's language, they chanted of wanting to trip from their mother's side to join the girlish troop in graceful rivalry, and let the shading tresses flow over their face beneath the embroidered veil, they seemed rather ashamed of these lady-like aspirations. Of Mr. Charles Wood's music this is hardly the place to speak; but it was generally agreed that it showed much inventiveness, and was by no means deficient in melody. The overture and the second chorus proved to be the most popular numbers. The stage-management was in the competent hands of Mr. Stanley Leathes; and Mr. J. W. Clark, as usual, gave the committee the benefit of his long dramatic experience, and acted as its secretary and treasurer.

H. F. WILSON.

STAGE NOTES.

MR. IRVING'S return to the Lyceum Theatre will not be accomplished until the New Year is at least several weeks old, and meantime the theatre will be occupied, as it was occupied last Christmas, by Mr. Oscar Barrett's Company for Christmas pantomime. Some while since at the Crystal Palace, and, more notably, two years ago at the New Olympic, Mr. Oscar Barrett proved that, without doing things on a gigantic scale, it was possible to interest playgoers by the production of pantomime free from the vulgarity of the commoner clown masquerading in women's raiment, and rich in all that appeals pleasantly to the cultivated eye. Last year, at the Lyceum, Mr. Barrett's experiment was on a larger scale, yet still not unwieldy; and the colouring introduced upon that stage was, as it should be at that theatre, of marvellous beauty. Expectation runs high in regard to the nature of the fascinating vision which Mr. Barrett is now preparing for our Yule-tide enjoyment.

THE last weeks of the revival of Mr. Henry Arthur Jones's "Masqueraders" are announced at the St. James's. Mr. Alexander's illness has lately prevented him from playing his part; but an able substitute has been found for him, and the Dulcie Lardie of Miss Evelyn Millard has proved, as we felt sure that it would, a satisfaction to the wiser order of playgoer.

THAT extraordinarily finished and agreeable artist, Mdlle. Yvette Guilbert, has come back to the Empire, with her proper manner and her improper songs, with her long black gloves and her white gown, with her "Falernian" hair and slender figure. It was a very good move on the part of the Empire management to bring her over again from Paris, and it is possible that it may even afford occasion to the amateur moralists and self-elected guardians of other people's welfare to descend on the performance. Mdlle. Yvette Guilbert cannot in any case be long among us.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

MR. EMIL SAUER gave his third pianoforte recital last Thursday week, at St. James's Hall. His repertoire is an extensive one: Beethoven, Chopin, and Liszt, however, seem to be his favourite composers. With the exception of an organ fugue transcribed, he has not yet played Bach; yet surely one of Bach's great fugues would prove more satisfactory than the "Tannhäuser" concert-paraphrase by Liszt: the one is music, the other noise. Mr. Sauer's reading of the Sonata Appassionata was interesting: yet one could not help feeling, at times, that the work was being interpreted by a pianist-post rather than by a poet-pianist. There were some fine moments: others, however, proved disappointing. The best performance of the afternoon was Chopin's Fantaisie in F minor (Op. 49); the playing was extremely brilliant, and the reading was something more than a mere mechanical display. On the following Monday Mr. Sauer gave another recital, commencing with Schubert's "Wanderer" Fantaisie (Op. 15). All technical difficulties were successfully overcome—in this matter the pianist has satisfied his severest critics—yet, on the whole, the reading lacked warmth and imagination. For more than one reason it was a mistake to put so important a piece at the very beginning.

Schubert's Unfinished Symphony—one almost regrets to have to say it—is just now extremely popular. It was given by Mr. Henschel last Thursday week at the third Symphony Concert at the Queen's Hall, and by Mr. Manns at the Crystal Palace on the following Saturday afternoon. They were both very fine performances. In rendering the first movement, however, Mr. Henschel seemed to us more in sympathy with the music; in the second, Mr. Manns. The Palace programme-book reminded us that Schubert left sketches of a third movement. Perhaps now that Sir George Grove has retired from his arduous duties in connexion with the Royal College of Music, he may find time to add to his characteristic notice of the B minor Symphony. His many readers would welcome from his pen not only a description of the Allegro sketch of over a hundred bars (a sketch, in fact, of a complete Scherzo), and of a portion of the Trio, but also a comparison of the sketches of the first two movements with the published version: the differences, if not of special importance, are interesting. Herr Popper played his clever suite, "Im Walde," at Mr. Henschel's concert, and in his best manner. Herr E. Humperdinck's attractive "Hänsel and Gretel" Prelude was repeated "by desire." Miss Agnes Janson sang in most artistic style Berlioz's fine song, with picturesque orchestral accompaniment, "La Captive."

Herr Popper appeared also at the Palace Concert, and played in a Concerto for cello and orchestra in C, attributed to Haydn. The solo part was presented to Herr Popper, some twenty years ago, by an old amateur of Vienna. The cellist himself added the orchestral accompaniments. The music is fresh and extremely pleasing; it seems to be late Haydn, for it reminds one, at times, of early Beethoven. Herr Popper, in his part of the work, has shown much skill. The number of good Concertos for cello is small, and this new Haydn-Popper one will therefore be welcome. Haydn's original accompaniments may turn up one day; no one, certainly, would be more interested to see them than Herr Popper. Mention must also be made of Miss Marie Brema, who sang old songs by Rontani and A. Scarlatti, but was far more successful in two Irish Melodies arranged by Dr. Stanford, and specially and effectively orchestrated by him—Emer's "Farewell to Cucullain" and the "Battle Hymn." The latter is of noble character and full of latent power.

Frederic Smetana, the Czech composer, the intimate friend of Robert Schumann and of Franz Liszt, was represented on Monday at the Popular Concert by his Quartet in E minor; and this, moreover, was the first time that his name has appeared on a Popular programme. The book rightly informed us that the work is "not a German Quartet, but one written by a Bohemian of the Bohemians." The music is bright, clever, and thoroughly enjoyable. There are moments of eccentricity, but the composer always keeps within reasonable, if not classical, bounds. All four movements are interesting: especially the second, Allegro à la Polka, and the Largo, in which one can trace the influence of Beethoven and of Brahms. The work is a welcome novelty, and was received with enthusiasm. It will be repeated next Monday. Perhaps Mr. Chappell may feel inclined to introduce some day the composer's Pianoforte Trio in G minor (Op. 15). The Quartet, under the leadership of Lady Hallé, went, on the whole, well. M. Slivinski played Mozart's Fantasia in C minor: not the one dedicated by the composer to his wife, as announced and analysed in the programme-book, but the one which is published together with the C minor Sonata. The object of programme-books is to assist, not to confuse, the hearers, and this unfortunate contretemps might surely have been avoided. The performance of the Fantasia was neat and expressive, but the reading was à la Chopin rather than à la Mozart. The pianist was well received and encored. Miss Thudichum sang with success songs by Massenet and Bohm.

The concert given by Mr. Moberly's string orchestra, composed—with exception of two male double bass players—entirely of ladies, was interesting. Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, which opened the programme, was played with spirit and due attention to light and shade. The solo parts were well interpreted by Miss Winifred Holiday (1st violin), Miss Amabel Marshall (2nd violin), and Miss Maud Fletcher (cello). A short piece, "Mélancolie," for strings by Napravnik, a Czech composer, is quaint, and answers well to its title. A "Notturmo," by the Russian composer Borodin, is peculiar, and requires more than one hearing: it is a movement from a Quartet, and we fancy scarcely suited to a large body of strings. A Choral Dance by Rymnski-Korsakoff, from an opera, proved a bright, effective little piece. The programme ended with Tschaiakowsky's Serenade (Op. 48). Various songs and duets were sung by Mrs. Hutchinson and Miss M. Barter. The songs included a quaint one by De la Borde, arranged by Miss L. E. Broadwood, and two by J. J. Rousseau, arranged by Mr. J. A. Fuller-Maitland: of these the accompaniment seemed to us the better half.

The second of the St. James's Hall Ballad Concerts was held on Wednesday evening. The programme was well selected, and the performances were all good; of course there were many encores. Mr. Sims Reeves sang Blumenthal's "The Requit" in his usual artistic style. The principal lady vocalists were Mesdames Stirling, Gomez, Miss Ella Russell, and Miss Kate Cove. Mr. Ben Davies was received with enthusiasm. Violin solos were contributed by M. J. Wolff, and pianoforte solos by Mr. Slivinski. The Meister Glee Singers added much to the enjoyment of the evening.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

SIR GEORGE GROVE has resigned the principalship of the Royal College of Music, and Dr. C. H. H. Parry has been appointed his successor. The late Principal, though not a professional musician, is an enthusiastic lover of the art; and his researches and writings in connexion with Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Schubert, likewise his editorship of the Dictionary of Music and Musicians, proved strong qualifications for the post. Sir George, after a long and busy career, now retires from active life. Dr. Parry has for many years worked earnestly in the cause of English musical art, and his appointment affords a guarantee for the future prosperity of the College.

WE are glad to announce the appearance of the London Symphony Orchestra Company, which has been formed for the purpose of maintaining a permanent orchestra in London: that is to say, one of which all the members shall practise and perform together under the same conductor for at least six months of the year. The conductor and musical director of the proposed orchestra will be Mr. Henschel.

THE arrangements with America having been completed, Messrs. Boosey will publish on Monday Mrs. Raymond Maude's setting of the "Rhymes about a Little Woman" from Mr. William Canton's The Invisible Playmate.

"This daintily bound and prettily printed book is a gathering together of thoughts upon the end to which all things draw. No more exquisite gift to a bereaved friend has been yet compiled. It is the artistic product of love's labour."—Christian World.

THE HUMOUR AND PATHOS OF ANGLO-INDIAN LIFE.

EXTRACTS from his BROTHER'S NOTE-BOOK. Made by Dr. TICKLEMORE. Edited by J. E. MAYER, M.D.
"After all that has been told us by Mr. Kipling, India has still its unknown regions and its inner ring of mystery. In this book many interesting side-lights are cast on the life of our fellow-countrymen in out-of-the-way Indian districts. Some of the stories would serve excellently as the skeletons of three-volume novels. Even the most astonishing have an unmistakable stamp of veracity."—British Weekly.

THE HISTORY OF HADDLESEY: Past and Present.

By Rev. J. N. WORSFOLD. With Notices of many neighbouring Parishes and Townships, including Birken, Brayton, Burn, Carlton, Cowick, Drax, Egghoro, Kellington, Roal, Pontefract, Solby, Snaith, &c.
"Haddelsey is fortunate in its rector-historian, for Mr. Worsfold, with what must have been infinite pains, has collected all the varied materials which in past centuries have given distinction to his parish, and woven them into an attractive story.... The writing of a local history so full of more than local interest could not have been an easy task, but Mr. Worsfold has accomplished it with much success."—Yorkshire Herald.

THE KING'S LAST VIGIL, AND OTHER POEMS.

By LADY LINDSAY.

Second Edition. Price 5s.

Times.—"Lady Lindsay has generous sympathies, graceful fancy, skill, and variety of versification, a wide reach of thought, and a broad range of theme. Among contemporary singers Lady Lindsay should take no undistinguished rank."

New Review.—"It may at least be maintained that she combines them [the secrets of simplicity and distinction] in a very high degree—in a degree not too common in contemporary art, and in a degree that proves her to be touched with the true inaccessible spirit of poetry, the spirit which (to use the outworn formula) is born and not created."

Speaker.—"This volume contains a notable deal of genuine poetry, expressed with admirable art."

World.—"The little touches of mirth, the sweet and solemn tones of melancholy, the bird-music, and the fine correctness and completeness of the sonnet forms in which some of the best and highest thoughts of the poetess find expression, are equally rare and admirable."

Glasgow Herald.—"The whole book is full of charm."

Of "The King's Last Vigil" Mr. GLADSTONE wrote:—"It appears to me that the idea is very poetical, and the expression of it in a tone so reverent and tender cannot but do good."

ELECTRIC TRANSMISSION of ENERGY, and its TRANSFORMATION, SUB-DIVISION, and DISTRIBUTION. A Practical Handbook. By GIBBERT KAPP, M.Inst.C.E., M.I.E.E. With 166 Illustrations.

"We cannot speak too highly of this admirable book."—Electrical Review.
"We have looked at this book more from the commercial than the scientific point of view, because the future of electrical transmission of energy depends upon the enterprise of commercial men, and not so much upon men of science. The latter have carried their work to a point, as is admirably shown by Mr. Kapp in his work, where the former should take hold."—Engineer.

THE LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMPANY, LIMITED.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed for the purpose of establishing in London a permanent Orchestra (resident), i.e., an Orchestra all the members of which practice and perform together under the same conductor for at least half the year. Furthermore, in view of the easier terms obtainable by reason of the engagements of the executants over a long period, it should be possible to popularise the best orchestral music by giving orchestral concerts with the best obtainable Orchestra at really popular prices.

THE COMPANY'S AIM IS NOT TO COMPETE BUT TO CO-OPERATE WITH EXISTING ORGANISATIONS. The Orchestra, when not engaged with their own conductor in the concerts proposed to be established, will, on reasonable terms, be at the disposal of choral and other institutions, festivals, &c., in London and the provinces. The advantages which would accrue to the managers of such societies, festivals, &c., in being able to engage with one negotiation a well-trained Orchestra, instead of being compelled to engage each individual performer, a proceeding very often attended by the difficulty of clashing engagements, the accepting of substitutes, and other managerial troubles, should render such engagements of the Orchestra as a body of not infrequent occurrence.

Applications for Shares should be made upon forms which may be obtained from the Company's secretary and bankers, and forwarded to the bankers of the Company, together with the amount payable on application. If no allotment is made the deposit will be returned without deduction, and where the number of Shares allotted is less than the number applied for, the surplus will be credited in reduction of the amount payable on allotment.

Copies of the memorandum and articles of association of the Company, and the contracts entered into, may be inspected at the Offices of the Company's solicitor.

REMINGTON & CO.'S

NEW BOOKS.

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS', BOOKSTALLS, AND LIBRARIES.

BY LADY JEUNE.

LESSER QUESTIONS. 1 vol., crown 8vo, cloth.

The Times says:—"Not only are these great questions in themselves, but they involve, either directly or indirectly, some of the greatest of all the great questions of our time—nothing less than the social welfare and prospects of the whole body politic. On these questions Lady Jeune writes from direct experience, and often with excellent judgment, with full sympathy, and yet not with unregulated enthusiasm."

AUSTRALIA REVENGED: a Story in which the Young Australian appears in his true colours. With Appendix on "Australian Governors." By BOOMERANG. Crown 8vo, cloth 3s. 6d.

The Telegraph says:—"Distinctly original." The Dundee Advertiser says:—"Is well written and maintains the interest to the close."

SHILRICK the DRUMMER; or, Loyal and True. A Romance of the Irish Rebellion of 1798. By JULIA AGNES FRASER.

IN a HOUSE of PAIN. By Frederic VYNON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE ACCOUNTANT. By F. H. Mel.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
The Scotsman says:—"A very well told and unpretentious story is unfolded in 'The Accountant.' It is impossible to avoid something like a comparison with Wilkie Collins. There is hardly a dull page in the book, and as a story it has quite a list of merits."

AN ELECTION JOURNAL: General Election, 1892. By "M." Crown 8vo, 5s.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S DOLLS. By Frances

H. LOW. With 40 Full-page Coloured Illustrations and numerous Sketches and Initial Letters by Alan Wright. Handsomely bound in cloth and gold, with 1000 copies, price 12s. 6d.

The Times says: "Loyalty, legitimate curiosity, and the inherent fascination of the subject for a large portion of the community will insure a wide popularity for the pretty volume which tells the history of Queen Victoria's Dolls. Profusely and very prettily illustrated in colours of the imaginary world with which the solitary childhood of Her Majesty was peopled by her own deft and busy fingers."

and J. A. SHEPHERD. 236 pp., super-royal 8vo, cloth extra, price 7s. 6d.

Two Hundred and Thirty-six Pages of Comic Pictures and Quaint Experiences at the Zoological Gardens. The Imaginations of Author and Artist alike run riot as they zig-zag amongst the birds, beasts, and reptiles which are collected in Regent's Park, the result being a book of much amusement and not a little instruction.

A BOOK FOR GIRLS.

TWO GIRLS. By Amy E. Blanchard,

Author of "Twenty Little Maidens," &c. Illustrated by Ida Wagh. 238 pp., crown 8vo, cloth extra, price 3s. 6d.

The author of "Two Girls" has evidently known and deeply studied the manners of young people in their teens, and she has reproduced for other young people a life-like book which will please because it is true and because its truth is interesting. One hears the infection of young voices through the pages, and seems to know and like the young folks to whom those voices belong. We ramble on in the company of Val, and Theo, and Archie, and Aunt Jauet with the queer old black cook Mammy Jane occasionally appearing, and go well through the year. Val is a cousin of Theo, who has been left an orphan and poor; but this makes no difference to their love and the fun they have, and the tale comes out at the end as all good tales should. As a gift-book for Christmas the volume would be admirable both in appearance and in tone.

STORIES from the DIARY of a DOCTOR.

By L. T. MEADE and CLIFFORD HALIFAX, M.D., Authors of "The Medicine Lady." With 24 Illustrations by A. Pearse. 372 pp., crown 8vo, cloth extra, price 6s.

This volume contains Twelve Stories illustrative of the various experiences met with during the professional career of a Medical Man in large practice. They are not less striking than those told in Samuel Warren's "Diary of a late Physician" whilst several of them are founded on actual occurrences, and others show the immense advances which Medical Science has made in these later years.

SHAFTS from an EASTERN QUIVER.

By CHARLES J. MANSFORD. With 25 Illustrations by A. Pearse. 288 pp., crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

A collection of Stories from India, Burma, and Afghanistan, each complete in itself, and all illustrative of some customs or modes of thought peculiar to the East.

The Liverpool Daily Post says: "He must be a poor creature who cannot cast aside sometimes all considerations of the possible and revel in dreams of wildest adventure, and for ingenious and exciting impossibility Mr. Mansford's stories, to us a classical phrase, 'take the cake.'"

THE BEECHCOURT MYSTERY. By Carl-

TON STRANGE, Author of "Margaret's Secret," "Two Worlds of Fashion," &c. 320 pp., crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

The Publishers' Circular says: "The lover of sensationalism will find in this volume much that is attractive. It tells of the exploits of a certain poacher family in France, and later in England. Poaching, however, is a mild offence to much that is recounted in these exciting chapters: murder and mystery are with the reader throughout, and should serve to make the book a very popular one of its kind. How the Champains set themselves into endless scrapes at home, and how they are connected with the mystery of Lord Srogan's death at Beechcourt, are forcibly set forth in an absorbingly interesting fashion by a writer likely to prove a very popular provider of fiction of a melodramatic character."

A BOOK FOR BOYS.

THE ROMANCE of HISTORY. By Herbert

GREENHOUGH SMITH. 292 pp., crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

A series of graphic sketches of the leading incidents in the lives of Masaniello, Prince Rupert, Marino Faliero, Bayard, Lithgow, Jacqueline de Laquet, Vidocq, Lochiel, Casanova. The volume is printed on antique paper, and bound in old style with uncut edges.

HISTORY OF THE FREE CHURCHES OF ENGLAND.

FROM THE REFORMATION TO 1851.

By HERBERT S. SKEATS.

WITH A CONTINUATION TO 1891,

By CHARLES S. MIALl.

THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW.—"It is essential that Dissenters and Methodist Churchmen should know why they stand apart from the National Establishment, and this knowledge can only come through the study of the ecclesiastical history of the last 300 years. . . . We ought to be specially grateful to Mr. Skeats and Mr. Miall for the light which they have shed upon the experiences of the Nonconformists of England."

TIMES.—"As a complete exposition of the history of Dissent, from the Nonconformist point of view, it is no doubt certain to retain its reputation."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"Readers will find here in a clear and attractive form much information which cannot readily be found anywhere else."

HISTORY of S. FRANCIS of ASSISI. By the ABBÉ LE MONNIER. Translated by a FRANCISCAN TERTIARY. With Preface by Cardinal VAUGHAN. 8vo, 16s.

"It is strictly hagiological in the sense that it accepts implicitly nearly all the legends and marvels with which the contemporary records abound. . . . The work is full of the interest which attaches to the engaging personality of the saint, and it strives, not unskillfully, to place that personality in due relation to the spirit of the age in which he lived."—Times, November 2, 1894.

A CHRISTMAS BOOK.

A FARM in FAIRYLAND. By LAURENCE HOUSMAN. With 13 Full-Page Illustrations, and specially designed cover by the Author. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Large-Paper Edition will be limited to Fifty Copies.

"We have seldom read stories which have afforded us more pleasure than the first five in this book. They are written with strong poetical feeling, and show much lively fancy—or we might say imagination—and a warm love of birds, beasts, and flowers. Besides this, they are original."—Athenaeum, November 24, 1894.

BY ORDER of the SUN to CHILE. By J. J. AUBERTIN. With Illustrations, crown 8vo, 5s.

"Mr. Aubertin went and saw, not as an astronomer, but as a layman. With Professor Schaeberle and others he enjoyed a magnificent spectacle, of which he gives a striking and unconventional account."—Saturday Review, November 2, 1894.

POETS on POETS. By Mrs. RICHARD STRACHEY. Elzevir 8vo, printed on Hand-made Paper at the Chiswick Press. Parchment or cloth, 6s.; vellum, 7s. 6d.

"There is no doubt that the best criticism on the poets is to be found in the poets themselves. There could not be a more delightful book for a lover of the poets to have. Mrs. Strachey has supplied her choice of pieces with a few notes, and with a brief introduction, which add something to its value."—Scotsman, November 10, 1894.

Cleverly Illustrated.

PROVERBS in PORCELAIN, to which is added "AU REVOIR," a Dramatic Vignette. By AUSTIN DOBSON. With 25 Illustrations by Bernard Partridge. Small 4to, 5s. A limited number of copies may be had printed on large paper, 21s. net.

"No one has a lighter, and brighter, and firmer, but at the same time more delicate, touch than Mr. Austin Dobson; no illustrator could more aptly follow and interpret Proverbs in Porcelain than Mr. Bernard Partridge."—Athenaeum.

ELZEVR SERIES.

New Volume.

THE KING'S LAST VIGIL. By Lady LINDSAY, Author of "Lyrics, and other Poems." Elzevir 8vo, printed on hand-made paper, 5s.

"Lady Lindsay's new volume illustrates the remarkable variety of her literary powers. Legend, allegory, ballad, sonnet, ode, love-song, genre-poem—all these forms she handles, and in each she accomplishes something artistic."—Speaker, November 3, 1894.

"Several volumes of recent verse demand a passing notice and appreciation. Among these the first place belongs to 'The King's Last Vigil.'"—Times, November 9, 1894.

WEIRD TALES from NORTHERN SEAS. From the Danish of JONAS LIE. Translated by R. NISBET BAIN. With 12 Illustrations by Laurence Housman. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"The student of folk-lore will be delighted with these gloomy legends of the Traug and the Gan-Finn, embodying as they do myths as ancient as the origin of the Danes themselves. All have a wildness and fierceness quite in keeping with the stormy coasts and seas they belong to, and are told with great effect, and without losing much in translation."—Spectator.

CANDIDUCCIA: Scenes from Roman Life. By the MARCHESA THEODOLI, Author of "Under Pressure." 2 vols., crown 8vo, 12s. net.

SUPPLEMENT.

The Odes of Horace. Translated into English by the Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone. (John Murray.)

No reader of the ACADEMY can possibly require to be reminded of the exceptional interest attaching to this book. I make, therefore, no further allusion to the circumstances, except by regretting an omission in the preface. Never again shall we have so good an opportunity of an answer to the question most of us have asked in vain—viz., wherein consists the enduring charm of Horace's poetry? It is a charm that does not wax and wane, like so many others: youth and age, students and public men, own it equally. If the love of Horace is seldom a passionate enthusiasm, it is seldom a merely tepid liking. Some particle of the divine breath was given to Horace in perpetuity; but it is indefinable and incommunicable, as many translators have found to their cost. But all would have welcomed another page, or half page, or even sentence, from Mr. Gladstone, to tell us what the poet's essential attraction, for him, has been. But we are left to conjecture. He calls Horace (p. vi.) "a personality highly interesting, and yet more signally instructive." Does this mean that the didactic element in Horace constitutes his highest value, in his translator's eyes? I do not believe this is what was meant; but the comment is vague, and one would have liked a decided view.

The ordinary judgment appears to be that Horace is popular because he presents worldliness with incomparable grace, and with a touch of romance. This, I am convinced, is wrong. Horace is really great in proportion as he recedes from that worldliness which at times he wears so lightly and gaily. That absurdly overrated and wearisome person, "the man of the world," is less at home in the lyric than anywhere: the trail of the prosaic is over him. Mr. Lionel Johnson (I think) has somewhere said that "the ideal Shelley is the real Shelley." I do not feel sure about that; but I do think that the real Horace is the self-secluding, independent, country-loving Horace—the Horace who reached half, at least, of Salvator's ideal—to be a "despiser of Wealth and of Death." No doubt a high authority, whom to quote is to name, has styled him the "valet-souled versifier of Venusia"; but thunder can do almost anything except discriminate. It was not from his valet that Maecenas received both Od. II. xvii. and Epist. I. vii.

Mr. Gladstone's theory of translating Horace's Odes is that compression should be carried "to the farthest practicable point." (Pref., p. viii.). In one sense, everyone will agree with him: whatever else Horace is or is not, he is never verbose, and (in the Odes) never tedious or florid; and the translator who imports any of these defects into Horace diverges from his original in essentials, so to speak. But compression is a dangerous master; and, if one must choose, one would rather have all that Horace said, plus a little expansion, than something less than Horace said, in English syllabically compressed. In other words, overmuch compression means omission—and Horace suffers more than most poets by omission. Take a simple instance (Od. I. xxi. 12):

"Intonsum, pueri, dicite Cynthium."

Mr. Gladstone renders it:

"Ye youths commend the Cynthian well."

The theory is, I suppose, that Horace's brevity is better than Horace's choice of epithet—intonsum, accordingly, is omitted. Does it matter? I think it does, and gravely; not merely because Horace purposely put intonsum and pueri together to mark the point of sympathy, but also because it destroys the Greek background, the suggestion of Φοῖβος Ἀκέρσεος. These touches from the Greek are the last things which should be omitted in the interpretation of Horace. We shall never know the full extent of his obligation to Greek lyrics: all the more should we note the items which are discoverable.

Again (in Od. III. xi.), the following very spirited stanza—

"One, worthy of the nuptial flame,
One put her perjured sire to shame,
But one alone: consign her name, entirely omits the notable oxymoron splendide mendax, obviously Greek in its origin, if not an actual translation. Nor is it fortunate to have given one stanza, out of thirteen, a quadruple rhyme, while the rest are in pairs.
To deathless fame!"

But Mr. Gladstone's objection to Conington's doctrine, that all Odes in the same Latin metre should appear in the same English metre, seems to me unanswerable. There cannot be such parallelism between Latin and English poetry, either in thought or form, as to make (e.g.) all matter that suits the Alcaic metre suit equally the metre of "In Memoriam."

Speaking generally, I think Mr. Gladstone's theory of translation suits Horace best where the thought is simple and direct—e.g., in the latter stanzas of the Ode to Valgius (II. ix.):

"Yet Mystes lost remains thy theme Unchanged. If Hesper rise and gleam
At even, or fly the rising sun,
Thy plaint, thy passion, still are one.
Did three-lived Nestor evermore
His lost Antilochus deplore?
Did king, queen, sisters, lengthen so
O'er the young Troilus their foe?
Let weak repinings cease at length;
Sing rather the triumphant strength
Of Caesar, and his latest deeds
'Mid snow-bound mountains of the Medes.
Their river flows with bated crest;
And the Gelonian of the west,
Shut by the bounds that Rome decides,
In narrower precinct tamely rides."

It is not faultless: the touch of amabilem with Antilochum is omitted: the "Gelonian of the west" is misleading, and suggests that the Gelonians were in Spain or Gaul, though all that is meant is a contrast—not intended by Horace—between Medes and Gelonians: the rhymes in the third stanza are perhaps too heavy. None the less, the translation is excellent—it is really like the original, would really show one who had no Latin what Horace is like in this Ode. Very happy too, both in its lightly ironical touch and the ingenuity of its metre, is the version

(III. vii., pp. 88, 89) of the "Quid fles, Asterie."

What rank does this translation take in comparison with other versions more or less familiar? This is the question which it is inevitable to ask, and extremely difficult to answer: men differ far more about Horatian translators than about Horace. Perhaps one may take a fragment, typical of Horace in his pathetic mood, and see how it fares in Mr. Gladstone's hands, and then adduce one or two competitive versions, and leave readers of the ACADEMY to judge. Let us hear three stanzas ("Impudens liqui—laedere collum") of Europa's lament (Od. III. xxiii, ll. 49-60). Mr. Gladstone renders thus:

"Unshamed our household gods I fled,
Unshamed live on. Ye powers above
That hear me, would my steps were led Where lions rove!"

"These comely cheeks ere leanness kill,
Ere youth's sweet sap shall drain away,
So let me sink, in beauty still
The tiger's prey."

"Why loth to die? behold this ash;
Polluted child, thou needest but take'
(Thus cries my sire) 'that pendent sash
'Thy neck to break.'"

Let the next be Conington's:

"Shameless I left my father's home;
Shameless I cheat the expectant grave;
O heaven, that naked I might roam
In lions' cave!"

"Now ere decaying bloom devour
Or thin the richness of my blood,
Fain would I fall in youth's first flower,
The tigers' food."

"Hark! 'tis my father—'Worthless one!
What, yet alive? the oak is nigh.
'Twas well you kept your maiden zone,
The noose to tie.'"

Lastly, let us hear Mr. Rutherford Clark, in a slightly different metre:

"Shameless I left my father's home,
Shameless I dally with my doom.
Hear, Heaven, and let me naked roam
Where ravening lions lie:
'Ere sleekness seize the damask cheek
And the young victim pine and peak,
Let this bad loveliness go seek
The tiger, ere it fly.
'Vile girl,' I hear my father groan,
'Why thus unready to atone?
Knot on yon ash thy maiden zone—
That trusty zone—and die.'"

There is, perhaps, more strength about Mr. Gladstone's, but it is deficient in charm; Conington and Mr. Clark both come nearer to the expression of a "lyric cry": neither has missed the tragic, yet truly Horatian, touch of zona bene te secuta, which dwindles, in Mr. Gladstone's version, to "that pendent sash"—not a fortunate phrase. I am convinced that for flaws of this sort the theory of compression has been largely responsible: the hand has been so much curbed that the strength of Horace's poetry is apt to remain while the beauty disappears.

On the minor slips, as having been already sufficiently noted, not to say exaggerated, I do not care to dwell; a good many of them are in matters of punctuation, which, as all know, has an imp of its own. That imp has been busy with the penultimate stanza on p. 109—in which also there seems a misunderstanding: "metuens alterius viri . . . castitas" surely does not mean "chastity that fears to meet a stranger twice," but "chastity that shrinks from a second marriage." Something seems amiss with the last stanza of II. 13 (p. 62); the last line, particularly, cannot digest the double "while." "Plaguy Persian" (p. 83) is not quite happy for gravibus. It is not impossible, but is it probable, that quota (Od. III. xix., l. 7) means "at what rent"? On p. 118, "slopes of Aesulae" seems, in English, the wrong way out of the doubt between "Aefula" and "Aesula."

No one, of course, will wonder that Horace, or any other standard writer, has been of such deep and proved interest to Mr. Gladstone; but, apart from this, one can perhaps trace the reason why Horace has been a favourite with "chiefs out of war and statesmen out of place." What an eye for a political situation, or for a national peril, had this poet, so absurdly viewed as a trifle! Was this stanza—

"Tu, civitatem quis deceat status,
Curas, et Urbis sollicitus times,
Quid Seres et regnata Cyro
Bactra parent Tanaisque discors"— any fresher in 30 B.C. than it is to an English statesman in A.D. 1894?

E. D. A. MORSHEAD.

Life and Adventures of John Gladwyn Jebb.

By his Widow. With an Introduction by H. Rider Haggard. (Blackwoods.)

It is not a matter for surprise that two men having so much in common the one with the other, the likeness agreeably diversified by marked differences, should become staunch friends. Many of the closest friendships are characterised by these conditions, and such a friendship was that which subsisted between John Gladwyn Jebb and Henry Rider Haggard. A casual meeting at a London dinner party brought them together, and both men probably looked upon this happy chance as the reward of long suffering; for of all ways of making a lasting acquaintance this was the most unlikely. However, so it was.

Mr. Haggard, in his preface to Mrs. Jebb's book, tells with admirable tact and good taste the history of that friendship. At this first meeting Jebb talked of Mexico; and this talk led to others, resulting in Mr. Haggard accepting an invitation from his new friend to visit him there. The scheme was devised for penetrating to the ruined cities in the Palenque district, while the still more ambitious project, nothing less than the attempt to recover Montezuma's treasure, was planned. Then a cruel blow, the sudden death of his only son, brought Mr. Haggard back to England, and the ruined cities were left unexplored and Gautemoc's treasure undisturbed.

It is evident from what the introduction tells us that Jebb was a singularly large-minded and large-souled man. There was nothing petty about him: he was always for doing things on a generous scale. He was ever ready to sacrifice his time, his money, and his health, to risk his life even, should friendship, honour, or humanity make the demand. Absolutely fearless and true himself, he was unable to detect the symptoms of baseness in others, or, what is more probable, he refused to believe in instincts which might betray him into an injustice. The inevitable result followed. Beginning life with comparative wealth, he was gradually, indeed, one might say, suddenly, denuded of everything he possessed, so that (to use Mr. Haggard's expression) he left this world "almost as naked of the earth's goods as when he entered it." Sanguine, romantic, mystical, he never succeeded in getting the best of a bargain. In short, he was a perfect gentleman, to whom the very shadow of sharp practice was abhorrent. Being so, it was madness for him to embark in speculative business, for, in the case of such as he, the result must always be the same.

John Gladwyn Jebb came of a good stock, his family being landed proprietors in Derbyshire. At school that love of adventure, which grew stronger in him with the advance of years, was already developed. Mrs. Jebb gives interesting details of these early days. It was shortly before he sailed to join his regiment in India that Jebb received a strange admonition of his mother's death. The blow was a terrible one; since his nature was affectionate almost to a fault, and his mother was to him what his father could never be, for their characters had nothing in common. His time in India was short. His father's death brought him back to England to look into his affairs, which had been left in the greatest confusion. Before leaving India he had volunteered a pledge to his brother officers, that, should it be impossible for him to get back in six months, he would retire from the service, rather than by his continued absence deprive them of a furlough. This Quixotic piece of generosity cost him his commission. He then went to Oxford as a young man with a handsome income derived from Consols. Next, the devil tempted him and he fell. In other words, he put £23,000 into a gun-barrel factory, and in twelve months had lost the whole sum. Twenty years afterwards he met an official, who said to him, "By the way, aren't you interested in a steel gun-barrel factory near Glasgow? Because we are sending it a large order!" It may well be that many of the later schemes in which Jebb was interested will "turn out trumps" some day; but so far as the unfortunate subject of this memoir is concerned, everything he touched ended in disaster. He went to Nicaragua, where he had by no means pleasant experiences—earthquakes to shake his nerves, and fever and privation playing havoc with his constitution. He returned laden with rare orchids and curiosities, some of which proved to be spurious, but with no more substantial spoil. Then came the Overend and Gurney smash, and a further large drain on Jebb's capital. A few thousands saved from the wreck were put into an investment thought to be safe. But it, too, failed, to the surprise of everybody; and at the age of twenty-six Jebb was without money or the slightest idea how to earn it.

In this extremity he determined to learn agriculture, and spent six months on a lonely Highland farm. He had a very rough life. Then he chanced to assist in founding the White Star Line, which took him to the United States. But office work was repugnant to him, and he left the company without getting any advantage from his association with it. Now came a visit to Brazil, where he undertook the management of a coffee estate, and through his peculiar unselfishness and single-mindedness fell a victim to malarial fever. There is another extraordinary story of second-sight attached to this chapter. Deciding that if he was to live he must betake himself to a colder climate, Jebb returned to New York, and presently we are plunged into a series of most thrilling tales of adventure in the Rocky Mountains. Bret Harte never invented anything more sensational than some of these stories. To Jebb this life was after his own heart. He now engaged in gold mining, but got nothing but vexation, plus fever and ague, in return. His efforts as a pioneer ended in 1878 in Colorado, where he had some hairbreadth escapes. Jebb's next idea was to found a company to supplant, by a new invention, the eggs used in domestic cookery. This kept him travelling backwards and forwards between London and New York. But this Omelette Company was as complete a failure as the previous ventures.

We are now nearing the final period of this fascinating but ill-fated career. Overtures were made to Jebb to go out to Mexico, which he gladly accepted. His adventures there, and the anecdotes Mrs. Jebb has to tell, constitute the most entertaining part of the book. Most readers will be inflamed with curiosity to see the grim Aztec idol which wrought such disaster wherever it obtruded itself. The last we hear of it is in some city office. We wonder whether since its introduction there the affairs of the firm have gone to the bad?

Mrs. Jebb writes with a cosmopolitan air worthy of a Kipling. In speaking of sport and bloodshed she is careful to discard the feminine: she writes like a seasoned campaigner. This will make her book attractive to sportsmen and explorers; while the stay-at-home Briton will devour its pages with an interest tinged sometimes with envy, but just as often with the comfortable reflection that, after all, it is better to hug the fireside and read of moving accidents by flood and field than to take part in them oneself.

J. STANLEY LITTLE.

Elder Conklin. By Frank Harris. (Heinemann.)

MR. HARRIS has written so good a book that one is amazed that it should have failed so wantonly of perfection. Page after page glows with masterly invention, tender pathos, excellent wit: attributes belonging to the magicians of fiction. Its cleverness is often near akin to absolute genius: the dexterity of the writer evokes not only surprise, but a rare pleasure. Yet this fact still mocks one, that lesser books have revealed a more equable, a more unhesitating, management of subject. Many a feminine novelist has escaped disaster where Mr. Harris is shipwrecked. But the man who acts wisely does not always talk the best sense, and he who describes equally well a prize-fight and a sunrise is among the earth's greatest.

Astonishing, unfortunate, are the epithets applicable to the author's blunders; they can scarcely be dubbed unintelligible. Sometimes he is clever enough to display his stupendous strength; sometimes he is neither shrewd enough, nor humorous enough, to veil his weakness decently. The stronger, the more active, the situations, the better does Mr. Harris come out of the ordeal. Falstaff's advice suits him neatly: he should forswear this potatoes and addict himself to sack. To talk and act, to show their motives through their deeds, is what the personages of these stories accomplish with unerring skill. The moment Mr. Harris bids them think for the reader's benefit, they are but moulders of Board school platitudes and spineless heroics. Even in real life we mostly act first and reason afterwards, and an analysis of the thoughts and impulses of Mr. Harris's heroes is a disillusionising impertinence. We understand Elder Conklin, Sheriff Johnson, and Charley, until they are conscientiously explained; then their fascination vanishes as quickly as the borrowed half-crown of the conjuror.

The author has seen much of life in far-off places, but it is not contemplative and studious: it is a life lived more by instinct than reason. It is bad art, it is untrue to the nature of his models, to put complicated thoughts into the heads of such personages as Mr. Harris for the most part describes. Stray folk there are, professors and ministers, who steal among the sturdier throng, upon whose faults and virtues Mr. Harris lingers. But he never succeeds in making them interesting, and their most determined characteristic is an offensive priggishness. On the other hand, Elder Conklin, as he stalks through the pages, pulsates with life, convincing us in his most erratic moments. Here is his interview with the officer and soldiers of a United States army squadron who have come to evict him, which it were impossible to imagine better done:

"'Well, Mr. Conklin, here we are.' The earnestness of the elder appeared to have its effect, too, upon him, for he went on more respectfully, 'I regret that I've orders to pull down your fences and destroy the crop. But there's nothing else to be done.'

"'Yes,' said the Elder gravely, 'I guess you know your orders. But you mustn't pull down my fence,' and as he spoke he drew his shot gun in front of him, and rested his hands upon the muzzle, 'nor destroy this crop.' And the long upper lip came down over the lower, giving an expression of obstinate resolve to the hard, tanned face.

"'You don't seem to understand,' replied the lieutenant a little impatiently; 'this land belongs to the Indians; it has been secured to them by the United States Government, and you've no business either to fence it in or plant it.'

"'That's all right,' answered Conklin, in the same steady, quiet, reasonable tone. 'That may all be jess' so, but them Indians warn't usin' the land; they did no good with it. I broke this prairie ten years ago, and it took eight hosses to do it, and I've sowed it ever since till the crops hev grown good, and now you come and tell me you're goin' to trample down the corn and pull up the fences. No, sir, you ain't—that ain't right.'

"'Right or wrong,' the officer retorted, 'I have to carry out my orders, not reason about them. Here, sergeant, let these men hold the horses and get to work on this fence.'

"As the sergeant advanced and put his hand on the top layer of the heavy snake fence, the elder levelled his gun and said:

"'Ef you pull down that bar I'll shoot.'

Here we have Mr. Harris at his best, and it is useful to contrast the above with another passage, taken from "A Modern Idyll," where he is at his worst. The Rev. John Letgood, the hero of the story, loves and is loved by Mrs. Hooper, the deacon's wife. He has received a "call" from a fashionable Chicago chapel, and he is long deciding whether he should accept the larger duties and princely salary or stay at Kansas with Mrs. Hooper. The dilemma is neatly contrived, but requires defter handling to be successful. Mrs. Hooper, as are all Mr. Harris's women, is admirably drawn, but the man spoils the story. Letgood opens his Bible in search of inspiration and finds it in the text, "Whosoever will save his life shall lose it; and whosoever will lose his life for My sake shall find it." He carefully prepares the peroration of his sermon which is to surpass all his previous triumphs.

"At length he finished his task, but not before sunset, and he felt weary and hungry. He ate and rested. In the complete relaxation of mental strain he understood all at once what he had done. He had decided to remain in Kansas city. But to remain meant to meet Mrs. Hooper day after day, to be thrown together with her even by her foolishly confiding husband; it meant temptation and at last a fall! And yet God had guided him to choose that sermon rather than any other. He had abandoned himself passively to His guidance—could that lead to the brink of the pit? . . . He cried out suddenly like one in bodily anguish. He had found the explanation. God cared for no half victories. Flight to Chicago must seem to Him the veriest cowardice. God intended him to stay in Kansas city and conquer the awful temptation face to face. When he realised this, he fell on his knees and prayed as he had never prayed in all his life before."

To me, I confess, this passage rings false. A passionate man, such as Letgood is represented to be, would have suddenly revolted against the sin that beckoned him, and fled shamefacedly to Chicago; or he would have renounced honour and duty and allowed his passion to master him and destroy him. At any rate, Mr. Harris has not justified his treatment of the episode, for he has failed to convince.

I have dwelt at some length, and with perhaps somewhat uncourteous persistence, on the faults of the book, because Mr. Harris so wilfully woos disaster. The short story has become popular of late; but few can conquer its immense difficulties, and the creator of Elder Conklin might do so if he would. Only the select can write such tales as "Eatin' Crow" and "The Best Man in Garotte." Few are the authors who can create such living, passionate, wayward heroines as Miss Loo. Boundless ambition is not so good a thing as ambition kept within bounds. To know your own power and your own weakness is the secret of successful writing. Mr. Harris has no rivals in certain kinds of work: to delineate types of character and modes of life strange to most of us is his peculiar talent. If he will be satisfied to work this rich vein he may stand proudly, even as the hostess of the Boar's Head Tavern in Eastcheap, "in good name and fame with the very best."

PERCY ADDLESHAW.

St. Paul's and Old City Life. By the Rev. W. S. Simpson, D.D. (Elliot Stock.)

MORE than ten years have passed since Dr. Simpson began to publish what he had gathered from various sources relating to St. Paul's Cathedral. It is evident that his treasury is not yet exhausted, or rather that the patient zeal of the collector is continually replenishing it. What to keep for himself and what to offer to the public, is a question which the antiquary has often some difficulty in deciding; and in the present volume the contents are, in our opinion, rather varied than important.

Dr. Simpson directs special attention to the stories connected with St. Uncumber, whose image in the Cathedral attracted many devotees. It seems that the saint's original name was Wilgeforte, and that she was the daughter of a pagan king of Lusitania in the remote obscurity of the fourth century. Throughout Western Europe she was held in high honour among women, "bycause," says Sir Thomas More, "they reken that for a pecke of otyes she will not fayle to uncumber theym of theyr housbondys." Hence her familiar name, which appears in Germany as Ohnkummer, Kummernissa, Sanct-Gehulf; in France as S. Livrade; and in many liturgical books as Liberata, Liberatrix, and Eutropia.

Among the miscellaneous articles is one upon the funeral of the widow of Dean Carey in 1634—a woman of rare merit; but the editor, though admitting that "a certain pleasure springs from solving a puzzle," does not help us to discover who the Dean was. The most likely theory is that he was an illegitimate scion of the house of Hunsdon, and that in his Christian name, Valentine, there is an allusion to this circumstance. He does not give us a specimen of his eloquence; but from a sermon by a more illustrious predecessor, Dean Feckenham, he makes large quotations of a very interesting character. Feckenham, it may be remembered, strove with much forbearance to bring Lady Jane Gray to obedience to the Catholic faith, and won from her, as she ascended the scaffold, some kindly words of appreciation. His sermon at St. Paul's in 1555 shows that he could use strong language on occasions, as, e.g., when he declares—

"the trewe shope of Christe will not be decayed by the euill skreakinge and moste strange voyces of Martyn Luther, Martyn Bucer, Peter Martyr, Corolastadius, Zwynglius, Oecolampadius and other, the very pale-breakers of the unitie of christes church, the breders of al scismes and contentions in the same, y^e blasphemers of christes sacramentes, the subverters of all good orders and constitutions, the revivers of oldé cankered and rustie heresies," &c.

There is an interesting chapter upon "Hermits and Anchorites in London." They were to be found in the city itself (as perhaps they may still be found), and in the middle of the fourteenth century the churches of St. Peter, Cornhill, St. Laurence Jewry, and St. Benetfink had their hermits; while, in 1361, bequests were left to "the Hermit in the meadows beyond the Thames, the Hermit near Charrynge crossche [Charing Cross], and the Hermit near Bishopsgate." The hermit, it should be observed, was nothing like such a recluse as the anchorite. The latter never went beyond his cell, but the former wandered about with freedom, though without a companion.

Old London is a subject of which one never tires; and we can but wish that Dr. Simpson, who has done so much to make us acquainted with its religious life, may be able to continue his researches, and will permit us to share in the results.

Max Reichner, Pastor. By H. O. Ward. (Elliot Stock.)

IN A Modern Quixote we have the picture of a finely touched spirit, oppressed with "all the weary weight of this vast and unintelligible world," and resolved to do his utmost towards redressing its grievances. It is not by any means the first time that the Christian Socialist, or rather social reformer and philanthropist, has been pressed into the service of fiction; but Mrs. Kent Spender's portrait of Norman Colville is excellently drawn. Colville is the younger brother of a rough ironmaster, who has given him an Oxford education, and who looks forward to his taking a high position in the world, and contracting an aristocratic marriage. Alas! for these expectations, which are all speedily disappointed. Norman Colville spent his days in the East-end, mingling with and sharing the views of the labourers, and nursing sick children. In the end he disgusted his brother by declining to marry the fashionable, but frivolous Irene Caterlot, and the result of their open rupture was that he went off to Rome to study art for a livelihood. Once more his philanthropic instincts led him into difficulties. He befriended a model, Filomena, who believed that she could become a great singer; and, having been told that he had compromised her by his attentions, he foolishly married her. Her gross, sensual nature soon revealed itself; and she sank from one depth to another, until at last she died a victim to her own excesses, bringing a sea of trouble upon Colville before he was relieved of her. Even in her last moments, however, he manifested his forgiving nature; while the English girl, Althea le Geyt, who had long loved Norman, nursed her with all a sister's devotion, and brought back to some extent her consciousness of good. In the midst of all his disappointments and his lost ideals, Colville still remained the true friend of the poor, the miserable, and the outcast. The story of his career is full of interest, though we half suspect that the author is not in sympathy with his Quixotism. There is a subsidiary plot affecting Lord Melton and Irene Caterlot, who may be taken as fairly representative of the upper classes. The novel is worthy of close attention for its moral lessons, directly and indirectly conveyed. As the author is usually a most careful writer, it is a pity to find the name of the author of Treasure Island given as "Stephenson." We regret to learn from the Preface that this is the last three-volume novel Mrs. Kent Spender will probably ever write, on account of ill-health. She does not belong to that "advanced" school of female novelists which we could be quite content to see silenced, but we owe to her many readable stories distinguished by talent and an unobjectionable tone.

Mr. Robert Buchanan is not seen at his best in Rachel Dene. One or two of the most powerful novels of the time have come from his pen; but with these his present story will not bear comparison. Of course, it would not be possible for a man of Mr. Buchanan's talent to write anything without gleams of the old skill and power; and, accordingly, this tale of the Deepdale Mills presents us with some vigorous character-drawing. The young inventor, Jack Heywood, is a fine fellow; and his sweetheart, Rachel Dene, is in every respect worthy of him. When he is unjustly convicted of murder, and his sentence is commuted to imprisonment for life, she remains convinced of his innocence, and resolves to leave no stone unturned till it is proved to the whole world. Her brave and beautiful nature carries her through deep trials, and at length she has her reward by seeing the character of her lover clearly established. We confess to a feeling of pity for the reckless Captain Fitzherbert, who manfully effaces himself to save Julia O'Gallagher, being moved thereto by this one ennobling passion of an otherwise wasted life.

John Darker is by no means devoid of talent, and it has some humour; but the writer is evidently inexperienced in handling the materials of a long story. There is a lack of cohesion in the narrative, while the style frequently leaves something to be desired. However, the character-drawing is good, especially in the case of Uncle Mick, who cheerfully sacrifices his life for his little charge, Rosamund Plunkett. Rosamund's elderly lover, too, John Westropp, is a manly sort of Englishman, who endures obloquy bravely, being rewarded in the end by the hand of the woman he loves. Pepper Smith, the wealthy Manchester manufacturer, is really the "John Darker" who is responsible for the death of Rosamund's father; and the secret of his desire to make restitution, as far as he can, to the dead man's child, becomes at last apparent. There is a meddling marplot of a woman who is very melodramatic in her actions, and perhaps "melodramatic" would describe the novel as a whole. Some of the child-sayings of Rosamund are quaint and amusing. Pepper Smith also—who would be a total abstainer "if total abstinence were not so mixed up with Radical politics and dissenting views"—is absurdly humorous, and the cause of humour in others. His esthetic son Eugene was bitten with "the Oscar Wilde craze," and nearly lost his reason for fear his young wife should not harmonise with his new furniture. He worshipped Beauty, and fell a victim to it at last. His character, cleverly and sarcastically drawn, supplies an element of broad farce.

Mrs. Walford has been entirely successful in The Matchmaker. It is a pleasure to be able to read a novel from beginning to end with such genuine satisfaction. There are seven or eight leading characters in the book, and all possess distinct individuality. They are creatures of real flesh and blood, whose vitality impresses one. Perhaps the finest of them is Lord Carnoustie, the old Scotch laird, poor and proud, yet with a vein of tenderness running through his nature, as shown by his treatment of his poor daft dependent Tosh. For Lady Carnoustie, harsh and repellent as she is, and though she has almost crushed the womanly elements out of her three daughters, we cannot but feel a sentiment of pity, especially in view of the retribution which overtakes her. The narrative moves chiefly round Mina, the laird's youngest daughter, and Penelope East, a kind of cousin, who goes on a long visit to Carnoustie Castle. Mina breaks through the repression which has narrowed her life, and has a love affair with a handsome dependent of her father's. For this she pays terribly with her own life. Penelope had discovered the secret of the lovers, and did all she could to preserve the honour of Mina, even to the sacrifice of the man she herself loved, young Redwood, between whom and Mina she sought to make a match. Readers must discover for themselves how the matter ended, and we can promise them that they will be deeply interested in the incidents and episodes of this thoroughly human novel.

A Born Soldier, by John Strange Winter, is destitute of the least vestige of originality or literary talent. We have not read the author's earlier books—save with two exceptions—but there must surely have been something more in them to attract Mr. Ruskin than is to be found in this one. There is, indeed, nothing noticeable in it whatever except a questionable story of an Oxford clergyman, which might very well have been omitted, seeing that it has nothing to do with the plot. Phil Jervis, the hero of the book (if we can call him by that name), has told one of the foolish women who have been captivated by his glances that whenever she wants a friend she can go to him. Kate Vincent accordingly appears at his rooms in barracks late at night, and he persuades her to leave early next morning so as to avoid ruin for herself and him. Not long afterwards she is believed to have been found murdered, and he is tried for the crime. He is just being sentenced, when Kate rushes into court and saves him. The woman who was really found in the water had been wearing some of her clothes. If the reader likes to waste his time in tracing the ramifications of the plot he can do so.

The author of Lillieville describes his work as "a tale of adventure"; and that it undoubtedly is, so far as blood-curdling episodes can make it. Some of the horrors are positively sickening. It seems that the story was written with a purpose, though a doctor and a clergyman who read the manuscript took different views of that purpose. We, also, having read the book through are unable to detect its special purpose, though we admit that many lessons may be gathered from it. There is a great deal about the barbarities of the slave trade and the rivalries of Catholic and Protestant missionaries, and occasionally the author makes a very good point. The career of Jim Penton is likewise not devoid of interest.

For young people, Mrs. Meade's stories are like good wine; to older people, they "need no bush." Without pretence or affectation they are easily and flowingly written, and their pictures of girl life are both true and attractive. Hester, Molly, and Nan in Red Rose and Tiger Lily are all charming girls; and that quaint creature, Antonia Temple, develops into a perfect fairy of good deeds. Girls may still continue to show original qualities without deteriorating into that "new woman" who threatens to prove but a miserable exchange for the old.

The Intended is a weird psychological study of considerable power. When he has finished it, the reader will feel inclined to say:

"Do I sleep, do I dream?
Or is visions about?"

But anyone who begins this sketch must go on with it. It raises the old question of a double personality in a graphic way. The opening description of London as "the brain of the world" is very telling and incisive. Mr. Stacpoole has more vigour than finish, more strength than delicacy; but when his qualities tone down and mellow, he should do lasting work.

The short sketch, entitled Max Reichner, is a well-told story of the Protestant persecution in Bohemia, which practically lasted for several centuries. It was at its height, however, when Pastor Reichner lived his life of noble self-abnegation, and bravely laid it down at the last as a Christian martyr. His example was worthily handed on by his friend and successor, Hugh Werner. The story is marked by genuine pathos, and its various episodes are lovingly and skilfully treated.

G. BARNETT SMITH.

GIFT BOOKS.

Maurice; or, The Red Jar. By the Countess of Jersey. (Macmillans.) It was a wonderful red jar. A great many lauded proprietors in England would have been glad of it this autumn, for it would have prevented their fields and houses from being swamped by the floods. Such a treasure should have been more carefully kept. But if the Baroness von Brinkman was careless, what shall we say of her son Maurice, the hero of the book? Even if he did not know how important the jar was, he must have known that it was a prized treasure of his mother, or she would not have kept it so jealously guarded with many locks and keys. And what did he steal it for? Why, to get a magic bow which always hit the mark, and would give him an unfair advantage over the competitors for the silver horn. He was a thoroughly mean, unmanly boy was Maurice, and everyone was a great deal too good to him. It is true that he goes through a good deal of drudgery to redeem himself, but he might have been drowned by Querquex, smashed by Delfer, or burnt by Agni without much sympathy from us. We are glad that he succeeded in getting the materials for a new jar, but it is rather for the sake of his father and mother and their subjects than himself. Despite, however, the want of interest in the principal character, the story is so varied and full of fancy, that it is not easy to lay it down till we have come to the end of all Maurice's stupendous adventures; and there is every reason to expect that the next fairy tale from the same hand will be better still. We would suggest that it might be simpler. The mixture of mythologies is a little confusing. We have Nereids and Nixies, Gnomes and Mermen; all the creatures of Oriental, Greek, and Northern imagination are mixed together. We would also suggest that the human beings, and, indeed, some of the supernatural ones, might be a little less modern—Kelpie and Nix, for instance, are more like Eton boys home for the holidays than spirits of the stream.

The Real Princess. By Blanche Atkinson. With illustrations by Violet M. and E. Holden. (Innes.) There is enough originality in these stories to separate them for ordinary Christmas tales. They are not only prettily written, but cunningly invented, full of thought as well as feeling. They are allegories of life indeed, presented in such an attractive garb of fancy that the inner meaning of them is not discovered until the story has been enjoyed for its own sake. The exhaustive process by which the six honest councillors at last arrive at a decision as to which of the hundred claimants is the real lost Princess Vera, is a very amusing invention, and also a light and charming satire; and "The Fairy Key" would be almost equally delightful if we could quite reconcile ourselves to the marriage of the Princess to the shoemaker. The fault is on our side, perhaps. On the whole, of the first three stories, we prefer "Peter the Painter," which is quite beautiful in thought and execution. If we do not dilate upon "A Colour Fable" and the other pieces in the book it is not because they are not all good. Some of the outline illustrations are very pretty, and the book on the whole is to be "strongly recommended."

A Battle and a Boy. By Blanche Willis Howard. (Heinemann.) It is not often we feel so enthusiastic as we did after reading of Franzl and Miss Hildegard. The plot is very slight, but the character-drawing is excellent. A more delightful little hero than Franzl never stepped: his quarrels, loves, pleasures, grievances, positively enthrall us. Miss Howard must have studied boys carefully; for nothing is harder to do well than to describe a boy properly, so that he shall be neither a saint nor a bully, but a mixture of both. We confess ourselves deeply in love with Miss Hildegard, and wished we were Franzl when we came to the passage where that young lady is "pirouetting wildly about him" with an "Oh, Franzl, you are such a terribly nice little boy!" And Miss Hildegard was right as usual. Such a charming book for children and "grown-ups" has not appeared for a long time. Unfortunately, most authors who write for young people are far from being possessed of the ease and grace of style that Miss Howard has at her command.

The Queen of Beauty. By Ra Henry. (Chapman & Hall.) Good print and paper and clever illustrations predispose one to speak well of this gift-book. It does not belong to the "goody" department: it conveys no useful information, nor, so far as we can see, point any very distinct moral. The adventures of Prince Elfreston belong entirely to the region of romance, where fun and frivolity roam unmolested, and in whose companionship boys and girls are supposed to delight. How the Princess Bonibelle not only secured a good husband, but also the titles of Queen of Hearts and Queen of Beauty, will form the subject of much conversation in the nursery this season; and all will agree she deserved her good fortune.

Happy-go-Lucky. By Ismay Thorn. With numerous illustrations by R. Bauerle. (Innes.) This charming little story reminds us of that unsurpassed favourite of young children, The Autocrat of the Nursery, by L. T. Meade. The chief characters are the children of a London family, aged from four to eight, and their cousin from the country, a boy of nine with a loving heart and a heedless disposition, which brings him into innumerable scrapes, and earns for him the designation of "Happy-go-Lucky."

The Story of Alexander. Told by Robert Steele and Drawn by Fred Mason. (David Nutt.) The "story" told in this tastefully printed volume is not the history of Alexander as recorded by classical writers, but the marvellous romance so popular in the Middle Ages. Mr. Steele has not followed exclusively any one of the many mediaeval versions of the legend, but has selected from them whatever features seemed to him best suited to interest his readers, adding here and there new incidents of his own invention. Professedly the book is intended for children; but although we know of some children who will probably find it delightful, we suspect that it will be best appreciated by older readers, whom, indeed, the author seems partly to have had in view, as he adds an appendix on the sources and development of the story. It would hardly be possible to present the old romance in more attractive form than that in which Mr. Steele has given it. The style is excellent, being neither incongruously modern nor affectedly archaic. Mr. Mason's illustrations are in admirable harmony with the spirit of the story.

Fifty-two Stories of Boy-Life at Home and Abroad. Edited by Alfred H. Miles. (Hutchinson.) Even Christmas itself does not come more regularly than Mr. Miles's collections of stories for the young people of Great and Greater Britain; and as he tells us, in his latest preface, that during previous years no fewer than 75,000 of them have been sold, it is clear that they have made their way, and are by this time fairly well independent of critical commendation. Still, justice demands the saying of the one and only thing which needs to be said: that the editor's discriminating industry shows no signs of abatement, and that the present volume is in every way equal in attractiveness and interest to its many predecessors. The new collection opens with an exciting story of life at sea, "A Desperate Capture," from the always delightful pen of Mr. Clark Russell; and the remaining contents do not discredit their good beginning.

Fifty-two Stories of Girl-Life at Home and Abroad. Edited by Alfred H. Miles. (Hutchinson.) Our general remarks concerning Mr. Miles's new stories for boys may be applied to this companion volume, though it may be said that its excellence is rendered all the more praiseworthy by the fact that the tastes of girls are, comparatively speaking, largely neglected by the story-tellers, juvenile femininity being often compelled to make raids upon the literature produced for the boys of the family. Mr. Miles, however, seems to have found no lack of good material; and from the stories of those old friends, Miss Doudney, Miss Mulholland, Mrs. Gerard, Miss Mary E. Wilkins, Mr. Howard Pyle, and a host of others, he has compiled a most charming volume. Some of the new fairy tales are specially pretty.

Wulf the Saxon: a Story of the Norman Conquest. By G. A. Henty. With twelve illustrations by Ralph Peacock; When London Burned: a Story of Restoration Times and the Fire of London. By the Same. With twelve illustrations by J. Finemore. (Blackie.) Mr. Henty's two latest stories show no decline in the quality of his workmanship. As usual, he has read his history carefully, and gives little occasion for any reasonably indulgent critic to find fault with his facts. At the same time he is not unduly solicitous about local colour, and is frankly content to let his characters talk in nineteenth-century language. Perhaps the sentiments they express may be rather anachronistic sometimes, but boy or girl readers will not enjoy the books less on that account. Neither of the volumes will disappoint the many young folks who regard Mr. Henty's name on the title-page as a sure promise of an interesting story; but the seventeenth-century tale is decidedly the better of the two. Between the Plague, the Fire of London, and the Dutch War Mr. Henty has plenty of interesting historical material to work upon; and he has handled it very cleverly.

The Fall of Athens: a Story of the Peloponnesian War. By the Rev. A. J. Church. With sixteen illustrations. (Seeley.) This is not so much a work of fiction as an attempt to make history attractive by interspersing it with fictitious incidents and conversations. It is gracefully written, and will be interesting to young people who have some taste for history, though hardly to those who read merely for the sake of the story. Mr. Church is careful to tell his readers what portions of the tale are founded on authentic facts. The illustrations, which include three views of ancient Athens, are extremely pleasing.

The Adventures of a Breton Boy. By E. Mouton. (Sampson Low.) This is an admirable boys' book, and can be warmly recommended. On the 15th March, 1531, two Breton boys run away to sea. They do not return until they have visited many strange lands and people. In the sixteenth century Portugal reached her zenith as a colonising power. On the African coasts were neither ports, towns, nor trade, but Malacca and Goa were the capitals of the Portuguese East. Our adventurous lads not only visit the Golden Chersonese, but go beyond to Japan itself. The following account of the Japanese nobility recent events have made interesting:

"Their courtesy, their courage, their devotion to their friends make them accomplished gentlemen. Friends of good cheer and of gaiety, they are the most amiable and amusing companions in the world; and what governs all, and forms the solid foundation of all their virtues, is their faith in God, which, though mixed up with practices alien to the only true religion, elevates them far above the other peoples of this barbarous part of the world. And it is not only we who are of this opinion. On our return to Liampoo, we were told that Francis Xavier himself spoke of them with nothing but admiration, calling them 'the delight of his heart.'"

Not only lessons in geography, but lessons in tolerance for the opinions of others, are inculcated by this book. The boys visit Abyssinia, and see strange rites, which seemed to them "to imperil the eternal salvation of the Abyssinians." But their friend points out that it is the intention of these people, and not their error, they must consider. "Are the pictures of saints shown to us true representations? And the prayers we say before these sacred images, are they the less sincere and the less efficacious on that account?"

To Punish the Czar. By Horace Hutchinson. (Cassells.) This is a stage of the war which, as the writer tells us in a final digest of the whole, cost Great Britain 24,000 lives; France, 63,500; and Russia, 500,000; and added more than forty-one millions to our National Debt. There is, of course, plenty of fighting in the book: indeed, like the war itself, it is most unconscionably long-drawn out. Mr. Hutchinson also provides a sufficiency of love-making and jealousy and country-house life of the "good old English" sort. In the beginning of the story Squire Wagland makes a speech, which being too long and too obviously of the hustings sort, may be accounted rather a bore by boy readers. On the other hand, it may be argued that such orations were actually made even in private houses at that period of history. It is rather a pity that the final incident of the story—the wooing by the spirited Alice Orford of George Raeburn in spite or because of his blindness—should be such a commonplace one. All the same, To Punish the Czar is an admirable story of its kind.

The Reef of Gold. By Maurice H. Hervey. (Edward Arnold.) The author of this book vouches for its topographical and geographical accuracy:

"I have myself," he says, "travelled over every yard of sea and land traversed by the adventurous gold-seekers (with the exception of the run from Cooktown to Valparaiso), and I have visited every place touched at by the schooner Maybloom."

No doubt this interesting circumstance gives reality to the story which is here told. But even had it been absolutely imaginative, from the family council at the beginning to the wedding-bells at the end, it would still have been a delight to boys; for it contains all the elements of a good sensational story—a mysterious box of documents, a cipher, a hazardous voyage, adventures, a mutiny, a little love-affair or two, and, of course, the discovery of a vast amount of gold. The book is written with great vigour and heartiness throughout, and most of the leading characters—in particular, Jack Hammond and Uncle Dan—are admirably sketched.

Her Loving Slave. By Hume Nisbet. (Digby, Long & Co.) This story, which is described as "A Romance of Sedgemoor," and which purports to be "from an unpublished drama by Mr. Hugh Moss, with permission of the dramatist," does not flow so easily and is not so full of stirring incidents as most of the books which come from Mr. Hume Nisbet's pen. But he takes great pains to reproduce the period of Monmouth and Jeffreys, the turning-point rather than the centre of which was the battle of Sedgemoor. Mr. Nisbet is especially successful with his portrait of Jeffreys. It is essentially Macaulay's Jeffreys, with a dash of Dickens's Quilp, as in such chuckles as "Oh, Scrapy, Scrapy, thou thought'st thou had caught a fly yestreen." Jeffrey's peculiar—and peculiarly merciful—treatment of the hero of the story, Sir Harry Dunulph, is very cleverly sketched. Since storm and bloodshed cloud the book, it may be well to state that in the long run all ends well for the good folk who figure in it—particularly for Sir Harry and his Ruth.

The Two Clippers. By F. Frankfort Moore. (S.P.C.K.) Boys will find this a typical book of Australian life and adventure. The sheep-run, the forest fire, the bush and bushrangers, the trading cruise and the brush with savages, the treasure-ship and the happy conclusion—all these are vividly described. There is an old-fashioned moral, contained in the fact that a much larger fortune may be derived by using the patent sheep-clipper than by starting on voyages of discovery in a clipper vessel. A book by the author of Tre, Pol, and Pen is always welcome.

In the Wilds of the West Coast. By J. Macdonald Oxley. (Nelson.) That fertile land for adventures, the old Hudson Bay Company's possessions, is once more drawn upon in this book. Sea-life off Vancouver's Island, fights with Indians, hunting fur-seals and sea-otters, whale-fishing, and a dozen more exciting topics follow each other in quick succession. It is a perfect treasure for boys. Mr. Oxley writes with plenty of animation. This and the preceding book ought to be very popular at Christmas.

Son'wester and Sword. By Hugh St. Leger. (Blackie.) The author of this exciting volume describes it very accurately in his second title as "a story of struggle on sea and land." Jack Decker, who makes his first voyage as an apprentice on board the Chackma—which is described as "a smart clipper barque of about 500 tons register, bound for the River Plate with a general cargo ranging from boilers and engines to cases of jam and bonnet-boxes"—manages to make the acquaintance of sharks, mutineers, jaguars, and Soudanese. It may be said that this variety of adventures is a trifle too incredible. It is very entertaining, nevertheless. Jack Decker and his shipmate and chum, Antony Cradock, are very good fellows, of the sort that boys are sure to appreciate. Above all things, the novelty of the plot is certain to prove attractive.

Shut In. By E. Everett-Green. (Nelson.) This book can be highly recommended. It is a tale of the siege of Antwerp in 1585 by the Spaniards under Alexander Farnese, Prince of Parma. Alphonso de Castro, the young Spanish soldier, is an attractive personality. He is a species of Cervantes in camp, a Spanish Hamlet with obstinate questionings, who will not leave the thinking to others. Thus he speaks to his friend, Carlos de Cueva, on the battlements of Fort St. Mary, overlooking the doomed city of Antwerp:—

"The Holy Office has been swept away from these lands, though men say it will soon be re-established here. It is just that which is the trouble and puzzle, Carlos. The Holy Church is of God. When men resist her they resist Him also. But the 'Holy Office,' as we are taught to call it, is that of God too? Is it possible that our Father in heaven has devised that likewise? And, if not, are these heretics so very wrong in resisting it to the death?"

No wonder that his comrade in arms cautions him that "in Madrid and Seville men have been sent to the rack and the stake for as little as thou hast spoken to-day." Whither the chivalrous Alphonso drifts in thought and conduct those who read this book will learn. The story's well told. There is an interesting reproduction of a Dutch print giving a plan of the siege of Antwerp. The War's End, the unmanageable vessel, which could accommodate one thousand men within her walls, is described, but, singularly enough, the fact that she was the first ironclad is not referred to. As the author justly observes, this sea-monster "proved only another of the gigantic blunders for which the siege of Antwerp is famous."

Swallowed by an Earthquake. By E. D. Fawcett. (Edward Arnold.) M. Jules Verne is here outdone in his own province. Mr. Fawcett's heroes are dropped into a huge cavity caused by an earthquake; and it is quite certain that "never before had a voyage such as ours been ventured. Three hundred feet below the valley of the Scherno we were threading a subterranean watercourse that led no one knew where." Here they meet marvels: dinosaurs, pterodactyls, and a "brontosaurus," to say nothing of savages of the worse type, worshippers of the fire-god and the like. After astounding adventures they find their way to the upper world, bringing back £400,000 worth of diamonds. The book must have been conceived during a nightmare and written (to use the author's words) when "fooled by a haschisch dream," while the illustrations are, if possible, more eccentric than the story.

The Yellow God. By Reginald Horsley. (W. & R. Chambers.) There is much more in this book than gold-hunting. The typical youth, who in so many stories sets forth to make his fortune, here meets a violent storm after leaving the Straits of Magellan, and instead of landing at Valparaiso is driven by shipwreck, storm, and mutiny to Australia. Natives and bushrangers lead to more adventures. Life at the "diggings" is carefully painted; but in spite of finding £6000 worth of gold in one quartz boulder, and £10,000 in another, the pastoral life is accorded the preference at the end. The fights and escapes are so terrific that no boy could lay the book down without reading from cover to cover. Mr. Stacey's pictures have happily caught the spirit of the text.

The Great Cattle Trail. By E. S. Ellis. (Cassells.) Mr. Ellis knows more of the Red Indian than anyone since Cooper. These pages frequently make the blood run cold as Indian braves close in upon the hero. The despatch of a large herd of cattle through upper Texas and Kansas invites the attack of a party of our old friends the Comanches, who are surpassed in bravery by none, unless it be the Apaches of the South-West. Thrilling combats and hair-breadth escapes succeed each other through three hundred pages. Avon Burnet's midnight ride among the Indians, beset with peril at every turn, is in the highest degree dramatic. The Winchester repeating rifle nowadays proves more than a match for bows, tomahawks, and scalping knives; and it may be feared that the chivalrous Red Indian is a thing of the past.

The Vast Abyss. By George Manville Fenn. (S.P.C.K.) Mr. Fenn gives as the second title of his new book, "The Story of Tom Blount, his Uncles, and his Cousin Sam"; and, perhaps, we could not better criticise it than by saying that we should have preferred it had there been a little more about Tom and a little less about his cousin Sam, and at least one of his uncles. The hero, such as he is, never seems to get out of the family stew, and in consequence the book suggests the idea of much ado about very little. The combats between Tom and Sam are, however, drawn with spirit, and the astronomical uncle is an admirable sketch.

Shafts from an Eastern Quiver. By Charles J. Mansford. (George Newnes.) This volume contains a series of short tales, all very exciting, and all, as the title suggests, relating to the East. To describe the stories would spoil the enjoyment of young readers during their Christmas holidays, but as a specimen we will give a brief outline of one. Frank Denvers and Harold Derwent, two travellers, with their Arab "nigger" Hassan, are at Conjeve, in Southern India. Hassan, in a street broil, is wounded by a fakir, carried away, and hidden in a silent subterranean place. The Englishmen find their way thither, and, after a terrible struggle with an infuriated tigress, rescue their faithful Arab. There are some excellent illustrations by Arthur Pearse.

The Double Emperor. A Story of a Vagabond Cunarder. By W. Laird Clowes. (Edward Arnold.) The second title of this book is misleading, if not defamatory. Even the best regulated line of steamers cannot help what happens to a vessel when it passes out of their hands. When the Philistia was a Cunarder she was not a vagabond; and when she became a vagabond, she was no longer a Cunarder. From beginning to end we fear that this story is untrue. It has not even a foundation in history. When emperors were more plentiful, perhaps one may have been kidnapped now and then; but in modern times, at least, we have only heard of one attempt of at all a similar kind, and this concerned only a king, and did not concern him much, for he was dead. If we were disposed to cavil, we might even object to the first title of the book. Because an emperor has a "double," it does not follow that he is a double emperor—it rather makes him a half-emperor. But now we have fairly exhausted all we have to say against the book, which contains a capital story very well told. It reminds one a little both of M. Jules Verne and of Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson; but it is original for all that, and interesting from the beginning to the end.

Stories from English History. By the Rev. A. J. Church. (Seeley.) These stories are written in the strong, nervous English of which Mr. Church is a master, and extend from the coming of the Romans to the field of Poitiers. The death of Beckett is told with much dramatic force, while such battles as Senlac and Cressy are described in a very different fashion to the old histories. Boys brought up on Mr. Church's pages will, at all events, have nothing to unlearn. The illustrations of the book are reproductions from Montfaucon and Strutt.

Tales of St. Paul's Cathedral. By Mrs. F. Lord. (Sampson Low.) These stories begin with the destruction of the old cathedral in the Fire of London and its re-construction by Sir Christopher Wren. Then follow notices of some of those for whom a grateful country has found a last resting-place within its walls. Of course, it is impossible to trace in detail the careers of Nelson and Wellington or the Crimean campaign within the compass of a few pages; but Mrs. Lord is a good storyteller, and we can well believe that she has interested, and will continue to interest, those who listen to her.

Heroes in Homespun. By Ascott R. Hope. (Wilsons & Milne.) The American emancipation is the subject of Mr. Hope's book. He succeeds in interesting his readers by a succession of pictures introducing the early agitators—Garrison, Lovejoy and Miss Crandall, for instance—and so passing to the great inter-necine contest—"where the best blood of a sundered people went to buy freedom's lingering victory." The book ends dramatically with John Brown's execution. Mr. Hope has taken considerable pains, and his narrative will please a generation which cannot remember the final victory of Abraham Lincoln.

Ralph Clifford. By G. R. Wynne, D.D. (S.P.C.K.) This is a picture of life in Virginia at the close of the Civil War. The story tells how Ralph Clifford and his sister came from England to seek their fortune; how they lost most of it in Washington through roguery; and how, through the kindness of a Virginian family, they found more than they had lost—including a subterranean cave of treasure, a wife for Ralph, and a husband for Rose. The narrative is briskly written, the scenes described are interesting, and the illustrations quite up to the average standard of excellence.

The Villa of Claudius. By Rev. E. L. Cutts, D.D. (S.P.C.K.) This is an attempt to depict the fortunes of the British Church at the close of the fourth century, when the power of Imperial Rome within this island had begun to wane. There is the usual love-story, which is much the same in every age and place; and there are accessories to the scene, on which Dr. Cutts's antiquarian knowledge freely expends itself. The villa of Claudius, hard by the Roman city of Colchester, is described with much detail, and a good deal of information of an interesting kind is scattered throughout the pages of the book, and there is plenty of incident. The illustrations, we must add, are commonplace and poorly drawn.

From Ploughshare to Pulpit. By Gordon Stables. (Nisbet.) The adventures of a persevering Scotch youth, while diligently making his way to "one of the best pulpits in a broad Scotland," are seen through Dr. Stables's transparent title. A good opportunity is given to interest the Southron reader in the manners and customs of Aberdeen University. It is needless to say that Dr. Stables in every page inculcates uprightness and self-devotion. Every here and there some singular blots show themselves. How could a girl "blush beet-red"? and why, in grouse-shooting, should the author speak of "that unfair driving so common in Yorkshire"? The example, however, of a determined Scotch student never comes amiss in an age of luxury, and Dr. Stables's presentment of it is excellent.

The Adventures of Leonard Vane: an African Story. By E. J. Bowen. (Hutchinson.) Savages, marooners, cannibals, leopards, lions, hippopotami, with a couple of love-stories thrown in—what more could boys desire? Mr. Bowen is vigorous and incisive in his dialogues, and inventive in his incidents.

My Cousin from Australia. By E. Everett-Green. (Hutchinson.) This is an excellent story for girls. Cicely Dumaresq, a young heiress, is engaged, without any active consent of her own and when she is a very young girl, to "the catch of the county," Sir Ferdinand Trevor. The engagement is arranged by her stepfather entirely to advance his own private ends. Suddenly Griffith Colquhoun, a nephew of the stepfather, appears on the scene from Australia. Cicely had expected to see the typical bushranger of fiction, bronzed almost to the colour of mahogany; instead of that, it seemed "as though one of the Greek gods had taken upon himself the garb of the nineteenth century, and had suddenly appeared amongst us." As Cicely was not yet twenty-one years of age, and attractive in every way, the natural results ensued. The neighbouring suitor, Sir Ferdinand Trevor, does not, of course, approve of his rival, and it looks very much at one time as if the Baronet—thanks to underhand influence—was going to marry Cicely; but the right man wins the fair lady in the end. The only fault we have to find with this readable book is that the wicked Baronet is a trifle too wicked. He is quite a past-master in villainy, and is, in short, qualified to appear as an Adelphi hero.

My Strange Rescue, and other Stories of Sport and Adventure in Canada. By J. M. Oxley. (Nelson.) Some of these stories are more amusing than probable, as when a boy, who has fallen into a hollow tree, clutches a bear, which is descending backwards, and is dragged by it to the top and saved. These travellers' tales are atoned for by several descriptive chapters—cod-fishing off Newfoundland, a sojourn among the Eskimos, and the like. North America is still a paradise for hunters, so that Mr. Oxley's tales and descriptions cannot fail to delight boys.

Across Two Seas: a New Zealand Tale. By H. A. Forde. (Wells Gardner, Darton, & Co.) Mr. Forde has put together pleasant chronicles of a family which emigrated to New Zealand some twenty years ago. Things have moved since that time; but the record of their struggles is interesting, and the local colour well preserved. It is to be hoped that in one respect, at least, this book may not prove a snare to would-be colonists. The heroine turns authoress and tells of the ready sale of her last book in England, and that the booksellers demand fresh MSS.

Rab Bethune's Double; or, Life's Long Battle Won. By E. Garrett. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.) This is a charming Scotch story, and the characters are well sustained and excellently delineated. The two old maids in particular—Miss Helen with her censoriousness, and Miss Bell, who is too easy to thwart or contradict her—are delightful. Some of the Scotch proverbs introduced are new: e.g., "Many's the bride that braks her elbow at the kirk door"; or, "It's the life o' an auld bonnet to be well cockit." The love-making is carefully worked out. Those who are in want of an amusing Scotch novel may be directed to this book. It contains several etchings of abbeys, of which Kelso and Jedburgh are the best. The following sentence may be presumed to be Scotch, "It was strange how little the bride herself bulked on the bridegroom's thoughts."

Olivia. By Mrs. Molesworth. (J. & R. Chambers.) Scarcely any writer can equal Mrs. Molesworth in her own line: that is, as a writer of stories for children. When, however, she addresses elder girls, as in the present instance, she is less successful. The peculiar charm which makes Carrots and Herr Baby the delight of the nursery is absent from Olivia, though, no doubt, she will secure a circle of admirers. The conversations are bright and natural; and there is just enough romance and love-making to please girls to whom the regular novel is, at present, a sealed book.

Lizette. By Emma Marshall. (Nisbet.) Another story by this popular authoress is sure to be welcomed by girls, even though it may not equal in originality some of her previous works. The truth, perhaps, is that, in these days of making many books, new situations are becoming more and more difficult to invent; and we must accept such a time-worn incident as an adventure with a mad bull with resignation. It might have been worse, as authoresses have taught us to reflect. Apart from this, the story has much to commend it. The characters are well-drawn—the three girls forming a good contrast, and little Dot a pathetic study. The tone, it is needless to say, is excellent; and the book is as bright, innocent, and healthy as it should be.

The Harringtons at Home. By Isamay Thorn. (Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.) The author, with her accustomed skill, has painted a beautiful family circle in this book—elderly uncles, a delightful old aunt, two impressive girls, with two brothers, and also two governesses. One of these is of the stamp contemporary with Mangnall's Questions; the other is essentially of the modern type, full of energy and character. She moulds the children to her wish, and is rewarded by marrying a curate, who is, "Oh! so good. He preaches beautifully; everyone says so who has heard him." If a little gushing at times, this book will please girls.

Enchanted Ground. By C. E. Smith. (S.P.C.K.) This is a very pretty story, simply told, of love, patience, and triumph. The heroine, Christabel, is charming, and her lover is a careful study. The critic cannot say, however, that the sentimental Welsh farmer and his wife are true to nature. Such words are not often on the average Welsh farmer's lips as "the light lingers so long on the hill-top, she forgets it will be dark" soon; or, "the glamour would soon wear off." The reader forgets these incongruities as the interest develops and leaves the heroine's character at the end as beautiful as her face. Jasper Holmes is excellently portrayed. Many much worse stories have often been sold for a guinea and a half.

Walter Gaydon. By E. Scarlett Potter. (Sampson Low.) This book is a tale of an art student's adventures. A story that commences with one attempted murder and closes with another cannot be considered tame or lacking in incident. Walter Gaydon is the son of a man who has been convicted on false evidence of a crime that he never committed. The son succeeds in establishing his father's innocence and bringing his persecutor to justice. The story is well told and the interest sustained throughout.

Through Love to Repentance. By Maggie Swan. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.) This story is so little chequered with light that it does not command much sympathy. At the end the villain is the only one made happy: his wife's love seems so independent of her will as to be almost fatalistic. When he steals a bundle of notes from his brother's drawer, it would have been more rational to take the sovereigns which lay beside them. The writing of the author is frequently careless: "If there is one author whom I hope will continue to honour us"; "It is seldom I write any in the evening"; "I went right away to her home"; and the like. There are many Scotticisms; and "reliable" and "inexplicable" are scarcely English words. With a brighter plot Miss Swan would command more success.

Miss Uraca. By Evelyn E. Green. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.) The motif of this story is highly fanciful: the visit of a rich baronet's son into the country to find a wife, while he conceals his true position. The heroine with the strange name, and, indeed, all the characters, betray a curious fondness for making long answers to the commonest questions; while the behaviour of Uraca's sister is too cold-blooded, it may be hoped, for any sister in real life. The authoress has done better work than Miss Uraca.

The Magic Half-crown. By the Author of "Crib and Fly." (Frederick Warne.) This is a pleasant story of honesty in humble life, complicated by the strange behaviour of half-a-crown, which might have belonged to Maskelyne and Cook. A good many people will sympathise with the sentiment of the hero's mother—"It's all education, education, standard this and standard that, at these new-fangled schools, but I never hear tell of a standard for honesty and truth-telling."

James Godfrey's Wife. By Mrs. Henry Clarke. (S.P.C.K.) The imprimatur of the venerable society dispels the fears which in these days such a title as Mrs. Clarke has chosen involuntarily suggests. It is not a study of the seamy side of modern married life, but an unusually well-written and wholesome tale of woman's moral development and the power exercised over others by a noble and consistent character. There is plenty of incident in the book. The theft of the bank-note, the strike at Bradleigh, and the fire at the tan-yard are described in a very vivid way; and there is a great deal in the story and the way it is told that will remind the reader of Mrs. Gaskell in her powerful novel, North and South. There is good purpose and careful work in this book, which renders it an excellent prize or gift-book for elder girls.

When Life is Young. By Mary Mapes Dodge. (Fisher Unwin.) These verses are a 2 unequal. Some of them are neat, but most of them are not. The same may be said of the illustrations. If, as we suspect, the verses were written to the cuts, it is no wonder that Miss Dodge's muse was a little "put out" at times, and it is much to the credit of both that the result is so tolerable.

A Mountain Path, and other Talks to Young People. By J. A. Hamilton. (Sampson Low.) Taking some natural object—a plant or insect—the author draws moral and spiritual lessons from it after the manner of Mrs. Gatty in her Parables from Nature. It is hardly to be expected that Mr. Hamilton's apologues could catch the grace and felicitous applications of that lady; but they are sufficiently interesting, and will make a good reading-book for the schoolroom. The big word "physiography" might perhaps have been avoided; and even if "we don't believe to-day that all nature is under the curse," St. Paul did (Rom. viii. 20).

Black Puppy. By Theodora Elmslie. (Ward & Downey.) The second title calls this book "A Story for Children. It should be 'A Story of a Babe for Babes.' The black puppy evinces marvellous instincts, and an unhealthy hothouse atmosphere hangs about the whole story.

Crowned Victor. By Hannah B. Mackenzie. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.) This is a serious story. Miss Katharine Cravin is the guardian angel of a young medical student, who is disposed to dissipation and bad company. She also becomes betrothed to a self-made man, Pearce Napier, M.P., but breaks off the engagement for reasons detailed in the book. She finally marries Mr. Napier, but not until her boy-lover has laid down his life for his rival.

Charlie Trench. By the Countess of Home. (S.P.C.K.) In the lives of two brothers—one seriously minded but paralysed, the other activity itself but selfish—the great realities of duty, love, and self-sacrifice are strongly portrayed. Guy, the young doctor, is a charming character. A shipwreck and the bombardment of Alexandria form a lurid background. This is an excellent book for a parish library.

An Unwritten Tale. By Jetta Vogel. (S.P.C.K.) This is an account of a household visited by trials. There is no so-called story, but a pleasant picture of unselfishness diffusing happiness around it.

The Young Pirates: a Story for Boys. By A. Eubule-Evans. (S.P.C.K.) This is a capital tale for little boys. Three of themselves seize a boat and visit a neighbouring island. There they are all but lost in a cave, into which the tide flows. Mr. Eubule-Evans's dialogues are spirited and amusing.

MR. W. M. HEINEMANN'S LIST.

A MAGNIFICENT WORK ON ART. MASTERPIECES OF GREEK SCULPTURE.

A SERIES OF ESSAYS ON THE HISTORY OF ART.

By ADOLF FURTWÄNGLER.

Authorised Translation: Edited by EUGÉNIE SELLERS.

With Nineteen Full-Page Plates and Two Hundred Text Illustrations.

In 1 vol., 4to, cloth extra, £3 3s. net.

PROBABLY no modern work on Greek plastic art has marked so much the end of an old era, and the beginning of a new one, as did Professor Furtwängler's "Meisterwerke der Griechischen Plastik." It was at once recognised as a reconstruction of Greek art in the fifth and fourth centuries B.C.; and among the many fruitful ideas in which the work abounds, there is perhaps nothing more remarkable than the conviction which it leaves, that, in the latter part of the fifth century B.C., a movement similar to the pre-Raphaelite took place. New lights are thrown on Pheidias, and it is shown that an unsuspected memorial of that master exists in the Dresden Museum. It is the summing-up of what has been done by modern archaeological scholarship in the way of reconstructing the record of Greek plastic art of the great epoch, from Pheidias onward.

This reconstruction is established on the solid and acknowledged foundations laid by Wincklemann and Brunn. The book aims at combining both monumental evidence and literary tradition. The author shows that there exist in our museums far more authentic copies after Greek originals than had been suspected. Thus the book marks the first definite attempt to apply to Greek art that "experimental method" which has yielded such brilliant results in Italian and Dutch art. Professor Furtwängler has been enabled to strengthen by additional evidences (derived in great measure from discoveries made during his visit to Greece in the spring of this year) statements which in the German edition might appear too purely theoretical.

The plates of the original have been re-engraved in photogravure, others added, and the whole scheme of the work has been brought into harmony with English taste. It is got up with the greatest possible care, the very latest discoveries in photography and process being used in its production. The price is much lower than that of the original, with which, in fact, it in no way competes, being almost entirely a new work.

TIMES—"The translation is an improvement on the original. We sincerely hope that, now that Professor Furtwängler's book has appeared in a worthy English form, it will be read as it deserves by English students in the Universities and elsewhere."

DAILY CHRONICLE—"Nothing can be more sumptuous than the manner in which Mr. Heinemann has produced the book.....The fame of these masterly essays has grown in Germany since their first appearance to such a point that even in that country of learned rivalries they are admitted to be a paramount authority in their own sphere.....It is impossible within the limits of a rapid review to do anything like justice to the immense volume of good material which the book contains. Each of the essays would constitute for itself a work of no mean order, and would repay an ample criticism."

An EDITION DE LUXE (Fifty signed and numbered copies) has been printed on Japanese Vellum, in Two Volumes, Quarto, and is now offered at Ten Guineas net per copy. After Thirty Copies have been sold the price will be raised.

IBSEN'S NEW PLAY.

LITTLE EYOLF. By Henrik Ibsen. Translated by WILLIAM ARCHER. With Portrait. Small 4to, 5s.

Daily Chronicle—"We have to take Ibsen as he is.....he stands out as incomparably the most powerful intellectual influence of his day, destined to affect the ideas of all contemporary writers who hope to live, and to cast a long and deep shadow into the times that are to come."

St. James's Gazette—"A miracle of dramatic construction, this play, with its terrible emotions, and their gradual purification. The dialogue itself is masterly. The characters, particularly the difficult one of Asta, are dexterously, firmly, solidly drawn. Of Mr. Archer's translation we will only say that it reads excellently, and should act as well."

Westminster Gazette—"Ibsen has never written a more interesting or a more intense and characteristic play."

"TWO VERY READABLE VOLUMES."

EDMOND and JULES de GONCOURT, with

Letters and Leaves from their Journals. Selected and Edited. With New and Original Portraits. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 32s.

Times—"On the whole the selection has been well done."

Scotsman—"The compilers.....have done their work so well that their book reads pleasantly on without a dull page."

Revue—"It is impossible to indicate the immense variety of entertaining and often profoundly interesting matter which these volumes contain."

THE SEMIRAMIS OF THE NORTH.

THE STORY of a THRONE: Catherine II. of RUSSIA. From the French of K. WALISZEWSKI. With a Portrait. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 28s.

World—"No novel that ever was written could compete with this historical monograph in absorbing interest, in the terrible aspect of the 'human document' that it furnishes, in the enforced admiration of the woman's ability, and the spontaneous repulsion from her mind and her methods which it inspires, in the tremendous retribution, the devil-delighting irony of her degrading death. The book is admirably written, and the translation is worthy of the original."

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

LIFE and LETTERS of DEAN

CHURCH. Edited by his Daughter, MARY C. CHURCH. With a Preface by the Dean of Christ Church. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Times.—"His printed works are before the world. All men know the literary finish, the delicate precision, the restrained power, the sound judgment, the vivid imagination which characterised them; but only those who were admitted to the inner circle of his intimacy knew much of the man himself. It is the merit of this volume that this is just what it reveals."

Daily Chronicle.—"The numerous letters of which this interesting volume mainly consists, tell the story of a life of great charm and strenuousness.....The volume is of extreme interest throughout."

LITERATURE.

Speeches and Addresses of Edward Henry, XVth Earl of Derby, K.G. Selected and Edited by Sir T. H. Sanderson and E. S. Roscoe, with a Prefatory Memoir by W. E. H. Lecky. In 2 vols. (Longmans.)

IN a prefatory note by the editors, we are informed that "the speeches contained in these volumes have been selected from those which Lord Derby delivered out of Parliament from his entrance into public life to his death"; and that they "are published by his widow, in the belief that Lord Derby's observations and conclusions, the result of careful study, may still be of use to the country which in his lifetime it was his principal ambition to serve." The further fact is revealed that, while utterances of a purely party character are by no means excluded—especially in relation to such themes as the Eastern Question and Home Rule—the greater number of the speeches now published deal with "what are popularly termed social subjects." The claim of the editors that upon such topics as the latter "Lord Derby's words are unquestionably valuable and suggestive," will be readily conceded. It may also be admitted that these gentlemen appear to have discharged their task of selection and arrangement with judicious care and skill. If there be a fault, it is that the collection is somewhat over-bulky; and a little more repression might perhaps have been exercised without detriment to the present utility or permanent value of the volumes. There can, however, be no doubt that the collection as it stands embodies in a thoroughly comprehensive fashion the methods and results of the late Lord Derby's incisive and perspicacious talents as a political thinker.

There is no attempt made to classify the speeches, which are wisely arranged in order of time, from 1854 to 1891, and which relate to all sorts of subjects, from industrial schools to the House of Lords, from the culture of fruit to the conduct of life, from Free Trade to Home Rule. Speeches on education, co-operation, coffee taverns, hospitals, and schools of art, penny banks, emigration, game laws, and the smoke nuisance, alternate with university addresses and party pronouncements. Whatever the theme, the speaker's method of treatment is uniformly the same. From beginning to end he is the exponent of translucent common sense. He never tries to be original, only to be true. He tests everything by the criterion of experience and utility. He is little troubled by fine-spun ideals or enthu-siasms; his social and political evangel is a Gospel of the Obvious. But none the less noteworthy are Lord Derby's utterances on that account. In an age of social storm and stress like the present, it is something to meet with a thinker who, with high moral earnestness and reality of conviction, discards all nostrums and deals with the problems that confront him with a calm and balanced lucidity which almost amounts to genius. His closing words to a deputation on the Eastern Question, in 1876, give the key to his whole method, whether as politician or social reformer:

"Do not imagine that you can settle this Eastern question by merely saying what you wish to be done. The question is not what you wish to be done, but what, in the circumstances, can be done" (i. 308).

In his excellent Prefatory Memoir Mr. Lecky says that Lord Derby "hated rhetoric," but that he "was a supreme master of terse, luminous, weighty, and accurate English." He constantly desiderated "a perfectly accurate habit of thought and expression." His theory was that "you can say all you have got to say in a very few words, if you will think it over beforehand. It is not abundance of matter, it is want of preparation, want of exact thought, that makes diffuseness" (i. 75).

The speeches now published are model exemplifications of this sensible doctrine. As far removed from eloquence as from bathos, they represent in verbal expression that via media to which their author consistently adhered in political action.

In the latter connexion Lord Derby's career, though not illustrious, was certainly notable, and in certain ways exceptional. After thirty-two years' service under the banner of Conservatism, during which he held cabinet rank as Colonial Secretary, as the first Secretary of State for India, and twice as Foreign Secretary, he broke away from his party on the Eastern Question in 1880, and, two years later, accepted office as Colonial Secretary under Mr. Gladstone. In 1882, the cleavage of parties consequent upon the Liberal Premier's Home Rule proposals found Lord Derby again in the ranks of dissentients, and for the remainder of his life he was the leader of the Liberal Unionists in the House of Lords. His cautious, prudent, and coldly analytical temper of mind unfitted him for great eminence either as party protagonist or as constructive statesman. He was, however, an exceedingly capable, diligent, and conscientious administrator; and, as Mr. Lecky says, "he probably saved every party with which he acted from many mistakes."

"He had a curious talent of making speeches with which everyone must agree, and which at the same time were never commonplace. Their secret lay in the habit of mind that led him to seek out the common grounds of principle or fact that underlie every controversy, and which in the heat of the conflict the disputants had often failed to recognise" (i. xiv.).

It is remarkable how small a difference is observable, either in tone or fibre, between Lord Derby's speeches before and after his party secession of 1880. The fact is, that though he had previously called himself a Conservative, and was now designated a Liberal, the same essentially Whig temper of mind and judgment animated him throughout.

That so much of his career should have been devoted to the Foreign Office seems almost ironical. He cared little for foreign politics. He detested what he called "the sanguinary muddle of continental diplomacy." He was little less of a peace advocate than John Bright himself, hating Chauvinism as he hated rhetoric or Tory Democracy. At Huddersfield, in 1880, he said:

"Do you think that Emperors, and Grand Dukes, and Archdukes, Field Marshals, and great personages of that sort really want the manufacturing industries of their empires to be developed? Do you suppose it would suit them to have to do with an intelligent, keen-witted, critical, and well-to-do population such as inhabit the northern towns of England? Depend upon it, they are not such fools; they know their business better. What they want is something quite different—a peasantry hungry enough at home to find the ordinary life of a private soldier rather agreeable than otherwise, and submissive enough to be ready to shoot their own brothers, if ordered, without asking why" (ii. 35).

To Lord Derby's mind the "Condition of the People Question" overshadowed all others, and politics was essentially that conglomerate of problems which deals with the establishment of right social arrangements. With the New Socialism he had no sympathy whatever. He was unable to take "a very rose-coloured view of what the future of society is going to be," and believed it "would differ very much less from the past than many sanguine and amiable people are apt to think." At the same time he was among the first to insist that "one danger to which we are now exposed in that higher social state upon which England is entering is that of carrying into social science the idea, the maxim, which economically is true, but true only in the strict economical sense: namely, that the relations of employer and employed—of the poor and of the wealthy—can be regulated only by the principle of supply and demand. That is not morally true, and never can be" (i. 11).

In a letter to Lord Shaftesbury, quoted by Mr. Lecky, he wrote:

"We are both public men deeply interested in the condition of the working class, and for my own part I would rather look back on services such as you have performed for that class than receive the highest honours in the employment of the state" (i. xvii.).

When, in 1881, he addressed the Annual Congress of Co-operative Societies at Leeds, he said:

"It is not in the language of idle flattery, but as the expression of a deliberate and sincere conviction, that I begin by telling you that the subject which brings this Congress together—the subject of co-operation—is, in my judgment, more important as regards the future of England than nine-tenths of those which are discussed in Parliament, and around which political controversies gather" (ii. 80).

Little need be said to insist upon the value of such a body of speeches as is here collected. When more pretentious utterances on similar topics are forgotten, the student, the thinker, and the general reader will alike be grateful for the opportunity of reference to the careful, penetrating, and clear-headed treatment of some of the most vexed questions in social ethics and economics thus afforded. Of the more strictly political deliverances this is not the place to say much; but friend and foe will both admit that no stronger presentment of the Unionist case has been formulated than that contained in Lord Derby's speeches on Home Rule.

Lancashire has produced greater thinkers and statesmen than Lord Derby, but none of more ingenuous and single-minded devotion to the interests of his country. His character was marked by a strain of that "heroic simplicity" which, in one of his addresses, he attributes to Lord Lawrence. As a politician, he would never sacrifice principle to party interest; as a social reformer, he never sought popularity at the cost of conviction; and throughout a long career of public service he strenuously and honourably devoted himself to the good of his fellow-men.

HIRAN TATTERSALL.

Edmond and Jules de Goncourt. With Letters and Leaves from their Journals. Compiled and translated by M. A. Belloc and M. Shedlock. (Heinemann.)

THE lengthy, valuable, and plain-spoken Journal of the De Goncourt brothers, the novelists and art-critics, as it originally appeared in French, contained (besides a good deal that was scarcely likely for any reason to interest English folk) not a little that was rough and unseemly, as English notions go. The two young ladies upon whom has fallen the task of compiling, abridging, and translating have removed all this for us, so that there remains that only which even a man may read. In what we cannot help considering to have been almost an excess of zeal in our interests, they have bowdlerised the original to such an extent that from several stories the point is, we consider, removed, and the significance of what is left hard to discover. But the effort was well meant; and, speaking seriously, the presentation of the volumes is, on the whole, satisfactory. The translation is intelligent, if not very finished: it needs, of course, an original writer of some mark to give to a translation (whoever in the first place makes it) the cachet of true literature—the ease and vigour of a piece of work which shall not suggest that it is translation at all. But, on the whole, the Journal of the De Goncourts has been well handled by its English sponsors. I make my compliments to Miss Belloc and Miss Shedlock, and proceed to read without fear.

The position of the De Goncourts in fiction and art-criticism is peculiar, and is due in some measure to the period of their birth. They saw the last of the romanticists; they were themselves among the very first of realists (I use the words for convenience, not granting all that the employment of such labels might suppose); and one of them has survived to find that, whatever be his personal success, realism, at least in the cruder forms of it, has come to be discredited and démodé. In England, as we know, it is the refuge of women without talent, and of men without patience to wait for the recognition that comes (and goes) more quickly by the presentation of the sensational than by the presentation of the excellent. In one of the later of Edmond de Goncourt's books, in La Fille Elisa—which our young ladies very discreetly tell us may be compared, in some respects, with Nana—there is perceptible, I cannot help feeling, a certain dependence on the realism that is only ugly. Of poetic realism—the only realism that I care for, the realism that we may find in L'Assommoir and in the Page d'Amour, though not, indeed, in Nana—there is in La Fille Elisa scarcely a trace. Yet of such higher realism Edmond and Jules de Goncourt were certainly not incapable: Sœur Philomène and Renée Mauperin witness to that.

In art-criticism, quite as much as in novel-writing, the De Goncourts have been "path-breakers." They have initiated methods, they have led fashions; and this notwithstanding (or shall I say perhaps because of?) their employment of a French scarcely more faultless than the French of the great Balzac; often just as much laboured over, and sometimes reaching, only with obvious difficulty, the mot juste—the epithet which is priceless, as long as it does not seem to have been paid for. But in art-criticism, alike when their style has been perfect and when their style has been charming, the De Goncourts have been on the side of sanity. They have been able to appreciate the relatively modern, the actually modern even, without extolling the ugly—without an unmixed eulogy of that strong characterisation which to some seems incompatible with the research of beauty. And from one very English affectation, the De Goncourts have not unnaturally been wholly free—they have never endeavoured to persuade themselves that salvation is to be found in, or culture proved by, a minute study of the Italian Primitive; they have never for a moment assumed, by the collections they have made, or by the articles and books they have written, that in reaching the fourteenth century we have gained the point with which is our most natural concern. Too serious to be occupied wholly with the contemporary, too wise to be entrapped by the fads of the moment, they are without the prejudices of the academic and the mediæval: they put in its right place the exquisite and brilliant art of Watteau and Latour, of Gainsborough and Moreau.

I wanted to define a little, for simply English readers, what the De Goncourts were, before (leaving their good criticism of art, for the most part, and leaving their interesting and highly individual novels) I went on to dip just here and there in the pages of their Journal, occupied less with the discussion of themselves than with the record of what they thought, what they actually experienced, and what was said in their presence, or in the presence of one of them, during thirty or forty years, by their not less distinguished comrades and acquaintances.

Among the gods of their early idolatry was the caricaturist Gavarni, of whom in course of time they made an elaborate study, producing the best known and most authoritative book upon his powerful, clever, pungent, sometimes bitter work.

"We asked Gavarni to-day whether he had ever understood a woman. He answered, 'Woman is quite impenetrable: not because she is deep, but because she is hollow.'"

Gustave Flaubert, in their earlier time, like Alphonse Daudet in their later, was a familiar friend of the two brothers; and it is Jules who records, in an interesting, very thoughtful page of the Journal, his impression—one may say the impression of both of them—about the book which followed Madame Bovary:

"Madame Bovary I admired without reserve. Salammbo does not come up to what I expected of Flaubert. The personality of the author, so well concealed in Madame Bovary, is here only too clearly marked, and asserts itself in bombastic and melodramatic fashion; the colouring is too heavy, and the style too florid. The effort is stupendous, the patience infinite; and though I criticise the work, I most fully appreciate the remarkable talent displayed by the author; but I fail to find in the book touches which reveal, as it were for a moment, the soul of a nation which has passed away. As regards the moral and historical reconstitution of a past epoch, our good Flaubert deceives himself. The words he puts into the mouths of his characters merely express the ordinary generous sentiments of humanity, and not anything peculiar to the Carthaginian populace."

In another chapter we find a record of what Sainte-Beuve said to them about their own Sœur Philomène and realism. He maintained that literary work of any value must be based upon the study of nature.

"He seriously doubts whether the Ancients really set so much store by that 'ideal,' which is now so much in vogue . . . he maintains rather that their works tended most distinctly towards realism, only that their reality was finer than ours."

They tell us, on the authority of Théophile Gautier, that "Balzac abhorred music." "Théo" did, we know. To him is generally attributed the saying that music is the most expensive noise of which he had cognisance. Balzac did not himself thoroughly understand it; but he was deeply interested in it; he treated it most sympathetically; he got, so it is said, a learned German to help him to deal with it elaborately, and not a little pleased, it may be remembered, was he with the result. Had any writer of fiction, before Balzac, ever analysed any musical composition with half the thoroughness with which, in one of his shorter stories, Balzac analysed "Robert le Diable," and all the method of Meyerbeer? And Meyerbeer, it is worth noting, was, in the Paris of Balzac's day—just half a century ago—almost the Wagner of that place and time. He was an innovator scarcely less discussed.

The reader of Germinie Lacerteux—not the least powerful, though certainly one of the most sordid of the De Goncourt novels—may be interested in learning, what the Journal tells him in full, that the original of that unhappy creature was their old trusted servant Rose. Rose was apparently devoted to them. They returned her devotion. When she was very ill, and it became absolutely necessary that she should repair to the Hospital, she went there in a cab, leaning on the shoulder of one of the two brothers. She did not long survive; and, at her death, a hundred discreditable things leaked out about her. It was an experience which the De Goncourts felt keenly; and in Germinie Lacerteux—which, since it is a work of art, owes of necessity something to imagination—it is on the whole accurately, and certainly tenderly, dealt with.

Of several of the famous talks "chez Magny"—that Restaurant has just now ceased to be—there is abundant record. Taine and Sainte-Beuve could not agree about Victor Hugo. Sainte-Beuve professed to owe everything to him. "The Globe staff used to call him a barbarian," he said; "well, all that I have done, he made me do it." Paul de Saint-Victor assented, "Yes, we are all his disciples." Then Taine, it seems, accounted for the enthusiasm: "The fact is, that what you call poetry nowadays means describing a belfry or a sky. Now I do not call that poetry. I call it painting."

And here—though, of course, one might quote indefinitely and scarcely charge one's self with dulness—here I take leave of this interesting chronicle of two most interesting lives. The life of Jules, by reason of his temperament, was one of feverish activity. He died—a young man, still—a few months before the Franco-Prussian War. Edmond, the elder—calmer by nature; an admirable writer, yet not continuously addicted to his literary work; profiting rather, as he himself tells us, by his instincts of a "collector"—Edmond survives, and, a picturesque and kindly and energetic figure, is scarcely old at this day.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

"THE OXFORD DANTE."—Tutte le Opere di Dante Alighieri. Nuovamente rivedute nel testo da Dr. E. Moore. (Oxford: nella Stamperia dell' Università.)

CLEARLY, this is not a work for beginners. It is designed rather for feet-on-the-fender scholars, lovers of Dante, whose love has grown old without growing cold; and to them it comes as a challenge. On opening this book our thoughts were carried back, some ten or twelve years, to a certain June day when first the glories of the New Schools flashed on us, and we sat, amid a crowd of aspirants, at a little table where were paper and ink and pens. It was the season of Moderations, and before us lay—the text. Here and there were words in italics, or words underlined, and it was in regard to these especially that we were expected to bring out of our treasure things new and old. Years roll by; our feet no longer tread "the stream-like windings of that glorious street"; and we are inclined almost to sigh for one golden hour of Moderations, that we may enjoy anew the sensations of hope and expectancy that marked that stage of our career. And lo, as Virgil says of the pigs, a miracle! The hand of Time is put back; we are undergraduates once more. True, there is no visual italicising, nor underlining, in Dr. Moore's edition of Dante, but mental italicising there is—blank misgiving or tantalising doubt at each familiar crux. Yet in all things there are compensations; and the lumber of notes, both instructive and obstructive, being cleared away, we are free, if we choose, to commune with the master himself, unhindered.

The production of so convenient a work, which a man might almost carry in his pocket when he goes a-fishing, is in itself no small subject for congratulation; but, compared with the other advantages, this is a mere item. And, first, let us observe that in these pages are to be found, not only those writings which are of undoubted authenticity, but all such compositions as are attributed, rightly or wrongly, to the subtle Alighieri. Even the Quaestio de Aqua et Terra, which, in an uncritical age, but otherwise quite unaccountably, was foisted on the poet of the Commedia, is received into this hospitable volume; and, not far off, the ten Latin Epistles, as demure and undisturbed as though no question had ever been raised concerning their paternity. Only one of the Epistles assigned to Dante is wanting—that written in vernacular, which has been rendered up to general incredulity. This, it should be said, is the sole omission. The Credo, the Sette Salme, and other pious efforts, though stigmatised as robaccia, have been retained.

Turning to the larger and more important works, we must express our genuine satisfaction with what has been done. The text has been thoroughly revised, and may be said to represent the latest results of that accurate scholarship which has been focussed on these Middle Age masterpieces for at least three decades. In this happy restoration Dr. Moore has played no passive part; on the contrary, he has contributed as fully and ably as any to its successful realisation. In his Textual Criticism of the Divina Commedia he gave ample proof of his interest in, and aptitude for, this difficult task; and in the volume before us he has carried his labours to their legitimate conclusion. Of course, we do not say that nothing has been left to be done; but we affirm without hesitation that the appearance of this work constitutes a "moment" in the history of exact scholarship. Believing this to be the case, we are glad that Dr. Moore has presented his introduction, title-page, table of contents, &c., in Italian: in short, has given us an Italian book. This excellent thought will render his edition easy of consultation for students of Dante in all parts of the world.

The text adopted in the Vita Nuova and De Monarchia is that of Witte; and the same remark holds good, in a large measure, of the Commedia also, but here Dr. Moore has allowed himself a freer hand. For this two reasons may be assigned. It was not only that the Oxford scholar had already paid special attention to this part of his subject; but Witte had, as he confesses, voluntarily subjected himself to certain limitations—to the support, indeed, of only four codices—which, on various occasions, caused him to violate his own sense of what was likely to be the true reading. Thirty-two years have elapsed since this great and (may we say it?) epoch-making edition appeared, and these years have witnessed the epiphany of many more variants than were then known. This circumstance imposed a new obligation on the conscientious editor, and, while not lightening his labours, inspired him with the hope of amending in final form divers passages which it is the prayer of all readers of the Commedia are corrupt.

It is on the text of the Convito, however, that Dr. Moore has brought his critical faculty to bear most effectually. This text was in a state to make any person of ordinary sensibility weep, while the audacity of sundry editors, far from improving matters, had resulted in something like a rifacimento. Now this, bootless to say, it is not the function of editors to bring about: we do not want a rifacimento; and Dr. Moore very properly rebukes the misplaced ingenuity, the conjectural riot and excess of Giuliani, and even the revered Witte does not escape a modified censure.

Dr. Moore's own methods reflect nothing of this unchartered subjectivity. Although placed at some disadvantage as a resident in England, he has sought to guide himself by the light of existing MSS., and principally of two codices which were constantly at his disposal. Of these codices one, dated 1463 or 1493, is in his own possession; the other, the property of the Bodleian Library, is apparently more recent. These MSS. do not seem to exhibit any close affinity, and, in Dr. Moore's opinion, belong to distinct families. This supposition, if correct, lends extreme importance to their comparison; and when it is added that a further collation has been made with the critical notes of previous editors, it will be seen that the text has been reconstructed out of solid materials. And Dr. Moore's mode of dealing with them has been exemplary. Now and again he has permitted himself to fill an obvious gap—e.g., by inserting "e" or "o" where it may have fallen out through the influence of an adjoining word. Otherwise it is very seldom that he has quitted his authorities, and then only when by a slight change a passage, unintelligible before, might be made to yield sense.

For the minor works the text of Fraticelli has generally been found sufficient, but in a form corrected and amended by Dr. Moore. In the De Vulgari Eloquentia, for instance, the codex of Grenoble, and the critical notes of Dr. Prompt which accompanied its reproduction in facsimile, have been utilised for this purpose.

The Canzoniere has been made over to Mr. York Powell, who has not only improved the text of Fraticelli, but re-arranged the order of the compositions. While somewhat averse from unnecessary changes in this respect, we have sufficient faith in Mr. Powell's judgment and experience to believe that he has acted discreetly. Lastly, we have a very full index, compiled by that well-known scholar, Mr. Paget Toynbee. The labour this must have cost, can be best appreciated by those who have undertaken similar tasks themselves; and it speaks volumes for Mr. Toynbee's disinterested love of Dante that he has persevered with this admirable means of reference. We shall be much surprised if this valuable work, produced with all the art for which the Clarendon Press is famous, does not give a fresh impetus to the study of Dante, the circle of whose adherents has, we are pleased to think, of late years been continually extending.

F. J. SNELL.

Asiatic Neighbours. By S. S. Thorburn, Bengal Civil Service. (Blackwoods.)

MR THORBURN comes before the public this time as a reformed character. In his unregenerate youth he held views concerning the Central Asian question which, he now admits, were hasty, presumptuous, and dogmatic. He has since invested himself with a new set of opinions, and, with the laudable object of encouraging the Government of the day, hastens to make them known. The circumstances of his conversion, however, are not altogether satisfactory. This momentous event took place two years ago. He had then served as a civil officer in the Punjab for three and twenty years; and the fact that all this while he was hopelessly astray, though he had fairly good opportunities, may perhaps lead some people to doubt his intelligence. In 1892, he tells us, it occurred to him that it would be as well to read up the subject in such books as are accessible to everyone. He did not, however, make use of confidential or official papers, because this, he explains, would have entailed further delay. It may, therefore, reasonably be asked whether, in the first place, there is any chance of a further modification of his opinions whenever he extends his studies, and, secondly, whether the result of his incomplete inquiry—without confidential documents it must needs be incomplete—is likely to be of real service either to the Government or the world at large.

Whether Mr. Thorburn will learn more yet, as he grows older, is a mystery of the future; but he is still disposed to be dogmatic. He describes Lord Auckland as a "weak, inexperienced man, entirely in the hands of an ambitious Simla ring of interested Russophobists." He adds, "The thought of being handed down in history glamourised Lord Auckland's better judgment." But it will be better to wait for what Sir Auckland Colvin has to say on this subject in his forthcoming Life of John Colvin. Lord Lytton, Mr. Thorburn writes, would not listen to reason, and ran risks merely for the sake of his party. Here, surely, we have the dogmatic. The well-known essays of the late J. W. Wyllie were written, Mr. Thorburn declares, "with the ignorant confidence of the young secretariat lion." Nine-tenths of his readers probably do not know what a secretariat lion is; but it is obvious that the phrase conveys no compliment. Curiously enough, however, Mr. Thorburn goes on to say:

"In a series of exhaustive essays he [Wyllie] examined with strict impartiality the arguments advanced by both quietists and alarmists, and gave his own reasons for preferring the policy advocated by the former. These (? which) arguments, though mostly written twenty-five years ago . . . are still so admirably pertinent that some are reproduced here."

How it happened that an ignorant person could write exhaustive essays full of admirably pertinent arguments, I fail to understand. It may perhaps be imagined that Mr. Thorburn is indulging himself in some obscure form of sarcasm; but the more plausible explanation is that the convert of 1892 is still wavering. This unfortunate tendency may be discerned in other passages. Indeed, it would not be difficult to re-write the book in the form of a dialogue between the hasty and presumptuous Mr. Thorburn of a decade back, and the more deliberate, one may hope wiser, Mr. Thorburn of to-day, with a mind matured by the perusal of books, parliamentary papers, and even magazine articles. In the chapter headed "The Difficulties of a Great Adventure," the author takes considerable pains to show that it would be a very risky thing for Russia to seize Herat and occupy Balkh. Her troops in Central Asia, we are informed, barely suffice to garrison the important strategic points within her frontier. Mr. Thorburn writes:

"The garrison [of the Transcaspian] is evidently barely sufficient to overawe Turkomania and Northern Persia, protect the Transcaspian, and keep communications open with Turkestan. To employ any part of such a weak garrison without reinforcements from Europe or the Caucasus on an external adventure—e.g., a coup de main on Herat—would be a risky operation. So hazardous would it be, that we may feel confident that before such a project is attempted Russia's Transcaspian forces will be materially augmented."

Is Mr. Thorburn an Irishman, by the way, that he should say Russia will not attack Herat with the present means at her disposal, until those means have been increased? "You cannot make bricks without straw until you have obtained the straw" is not a saying of the wise. However, one can guess what he means. He goes on to prove that it would be equally difficult to spare troops from Russian Turkestan, and the whole argument is thus summed up:

"We may assume that, until Russia consolidates her position in Central Asia by railway extension, road-making, and the improvement of her communications with her European bases, she is in no position to seize Herat or occupy Afghan-Turkestan, except on the improbable hypothesis that such action would not involve her in a war with Great Britain."

Here spoke the unregenerate Mr. Thorburn. Four pages later on the converted Mr. Thorburn intervenes with the remark that "a political conjuncture might arise at any time which might induce Russia to occupy Herat and Mazar-i-Sharif [that is, Herat and Balkh or Afghan-Turkestan], and there await developments." Elsewhere he talks as if the improbable hypothesis were quite a possible hypothesis. "When Russia makes the move, England will certainly bluster, and may ultimately fight." There is a wide difference between "may fight" and "must fight."

Nor when we pass from conjecture to matters of fact is Mr. Thorburn invariably a safe guide. Speaking of the much-talked-of Anglo-Russian agreement of 1873, he writes:

"So indifferent was England to the whole subject that, in 1873, when the northern boundary of Afghanistan was determined by an Anglo-Russian agreement, Russia's title to almost the whole Pamir region was conceded by a careless mistake."

The boundary agreed to was the boundary of Afghanistan; and in 1875 Lord Salisbury pointed out, in the most emphatic way, that the agreement did not leave Russia full liberty of action over all the territory situate between the Russian frontier and Afghanistan. A few lines lower down Mr. Thorburn states that the Murghabi is "the river of largest volume in the Pamirs, and, perhaps, on that ground to be regarded as the true main stream of the Oxus." This is a question which was very carefully examined by Mr. Curzon, in a letter printed by the Times nearly a twelvemonth ago. The Panja into which the Murghabi flows has a greater volume than the Murghabi, except in the months of June and July. It is wider during three-quarters of the year, and is always both deeper and swifter. Mr. Curzon's authorities are unassailable; and it follows that Mr. Thorburn, on a point of great interest if not importance, is misinformed. In regard to Badakshan, he says that previous to 1859 "its connexion had been more close with Bokhara or Khokand than with Kabul." Badakshan, however, was conquered in 1765 by the Afghan Ahmed Shah. For a considerable time, too, it was nominally subject to the Moghul Emperors of Delhi. Concerning the maps which have been drawn to illustrate this work, I should like to know why the cartographer gives a vast bend to the Panja river below Kila Wamar. This is a piece of fictitious geography long since exploded, as may be seen from a note communicated to the Royal Geographical Society by General Walker in May, 1884.

On the whole, I am not sure that Mr. Thorburn's book will help materially, as he hopes it will, "to the formation of a clear, decided, and well-informed public opinion." And yet there is much in it that appears to demand the serious notice of the Government. The author's observations on our dealings with frontier tribes, on the danger of over-legislation, and on other defects of British rule, point to a state of things which is far from satisfactory. On the other hand, we must not too hastily conclude that the Indian Government is neglectful of its duty, merely because the Commissioner of Rawalpindi thinks so, or because he talks like a lady novelist of "the Frankenstein we are creating in India."

STEPHEN WHEELER.

The Work of John Ruskin: its Influence upon Modern Thought and Life. By Charles Waldstein. (Methuen.)

FEW men of mark have been less criticised than Mr. Ruskin, which is a misfortune, for few, for proper appreciation, need criticism more. In his case eulogy, more or less indiscreet, and condemnation, more or less brutal—both based on insufficient knowledge—have taken the place of analytical and comparative criticism. "He who runs" may not read Mr. Ruskin's works with advantage. The glittering rhetoric is too fascinating, or the seeming extravagance of statement or doctrine is too exasperating, to enable the hasty or superficial student to judge wisely. Even careful students are liable to be biased, according to some particular "ism" of their own which they find is befriended or attacked. Only the fewest unite with the necessary understanding freedom from party ties and leanings. Dr. Waldstein is one of these. He has succeeded where many have failed. He has brought to his subject the true spirit of the critic, analysing it with an open mind, and basing his convictions on honest thought. The product is a thing rarely to be met with in these days—a piece of genuine literary criticism.

That we must accept Dr. Waldstein's estimate of Mr. Ruskin and his work, does not necessarily follow. Some of his statements and deductions are at least questionable. For example, take the statement he makes as to the function of science when discussing Mr. Ruskin's views on art. Art according to Mr. Ruskin, says Dr. Waldstein, "does not only deal with truths of aspect, but its main function is to discover truths of essence." This, he thinks, is fair neither to science nor to art, and he proceeds:

"Science is chiefly concerned with truths of essence, the inner constitution, causes of change, origin, future destiny of objects that lie below what can be actually perceived by the senses. Above all, the causes of existence and change are the true province of science" (p. 44).

Surely here Dr. Waldstein comes in collision, not with Mr. Ruskin so much as with the men of science themselves. Science is concerned with truths, not "of essence," but of order and arrangement; not with "the causes of existence," but with the sequence and relation of events in time and space; not with noumena, but with phenomena; not with why, but with how. The man of science readily admits that, so far as he is concerned, causes lie in the region of the unknowable. Ultimate scientific ideas, as Mr. Herbert Spencer says, "are all representative of ideas that cannot be comprehended," and the man of science "more than any other truly knows that, in its ultimate essence, nothing can be known" (First Principles, pp. 66, 67). Misapprehending the function of science, Dr. Waldstein has failed to make good his case against Mr. Ruskin's attitude toward art. In other ways, his argument in this chapter is not displayed to advantage. It would have been more forcible if it had been condensed. As it is, the range of the discussion is too wide, while any direct application to the main subject is infrequent. There should have been less abstract theory and more concrete criticism. Even if what Dr. Waldstein says is true, the way he says it is not convincing. Possibly, if Mr. Ruskin and he could come to an understanding, their difference would not prove to be so great as appears. As it is, what Dr. Waldstein means by "truth" is certainly not what Mr. Ruskin means by it: so the discussion as to the relation of truth to art is rather futile.

More satisfactory is Dr. Waldstein's treatment of "Ruskin on Social Questions"; for it is free from the faults of form just noted, and exhibits an understanding sympathy—even where there is not agreement—which is not so manifest in the discussion on art. Dr. Waldstein is of opinion that Mr. Ruskin's "strongest points and greatest achievements" are not to be found in "the domain of the theory and criticism of art"—a view of his life-work to which Mr. Ruskin would cordially assent. For, rightly or wrongly, Mr. Ruskin came to the conclusion that his truest service to mankind was to deliver the message contained in Unto this Last, in Time and Tide, and, more fiercely and desperately, in Fors Clavigera. Undeniably, the value of that message has been impaired by the overstatement of which Dr. Waldstein complains; but it must be remembered that Mr. Ruskin was concerned to attack the abuses of his time, prominent among which was the abuse of power and wealth by those who possessed them. Dr. Waldstein falls into the same error of overstatement, when he asserts that this defect in Mr. Ruskin's teaching has been "fatal to its influence." No doubt it has lessened its influence, and been productive of results actually mischievous. I suppose Mr. Ruskin is partly responsible for the prevailing form of Socialism, although, really, its spirit and method are condemned by his teaching. Persons who never understood the essence of that teaching have taken his angry denunciation of the wealthy classes as their warrant for a policy which could only be abhorrent to him. It is an instance of "the falsehood of extremes." Now, Dr. Waldstein says, justly enough, "we seem inclined to exaggerate the claims of morality, as our predecessors exaggerated the claims of utility." It is even true, as he affirms, that "the present altruistic wave of humanitarianism, which we can trace in the lives of the good people among us, is unbalancing the lives of these earnest people, and may lead to justified reactions which will retard sane progress." Mr. Ruskin may have helped to bring this to pass; but it is not a fulfilment of his principles. It is a fault of his too impetuous statement of partial truths. Yet, it might be asked, could a more less impetuous have had any effect at all? Moreover, if Mr. Ruskin's influence, greatly for good, has been somewhat for evil also, he must not be held responsible for all the vagaries which unintelligent persons, self-constituted as his disciples, choose to perform in his name.

One aspect of Mr. Ruskin's work Dr. Waldstein has not touched upon—its personal influence. Possibly his most important function will prove to be, not that of the critic of art, or the great writer, or the social reformer, but of "the friend and aider of those who would live in the spirit." For, approached rightly—that is both reverently and, as I have said, critically—Mr. Ruskin's writings stimulate the moral sentiment as few others can.

Husband and Brother. By Katharine St. John Conway. (Bristol: Arrowsmith.)

OF the twelve books on my list, five are by foreign writers, four by Australian, and one by an American. The cry of "L'Invasion des Barbares!" must now be shifted from Paris to London. Of this cosmopolitan fiction, of which we have now so much, this is not the occasion to speak; but I may state that, while there is always a welcome for what is of exceptional excellence, there is less need now than ever for translations of foreign writings which are merely good of their kind, much less for English versions of books which are second-rate or even worthless in the original. The other day I looked at a collection of about thirty recent translations, mostly of French books, of which there was not a single volume which justified its existence.

English or foreign, there is no work among those now before me which is so original as that of the late Francis Adams. A Child of the Age was intended as a prelude to a series of books, which should cohere on one broad, general motive. Masterpieces, Adams hoped and believed, they were to be. A Child of the Age is certainly not a masterpiece; it has not even just escaped that rank. Only the most ill-balanced judgment could claim such pre-eminence for it. At most, it is original, moving, often fascinating: a great deal, no doubt, but not all that is needful. It is also written in a disconnected, sometimes slovenly, and often grotesque fashion: and the "blind hysterics" of this particular Child of the Age are as tiresome and unconvincing as those of the much abused Tennysonian Celt. The method of Francis Adams in this strange book is that of a realist, who has reached the extreme of impressionism. If the story had been written with more reserve: that is, if the author had more firmly held the reins of his emotion, the result would have been much more impressive. In Francis Adams we have a belated member of the Spasmodic school, ready at any page to go one better than Dobell or Alexander Smith. At times he tells, in gasps and sobs and pantings, what restrained prose would convey with far keener and more profound effect. But there are passages, episodes, one or two whole chapters, which prove that Francis Adams was a writer of remarkable achievement as well as of altogether exceptional promise. The drawback to the book is its author's evident belief in the fineness of his hero's nature. But in actual life Leicester would be an intolerable person: insanely arrogant, exquisitely sentimental, and selfish almost to the extreme of brutality. If this is the new wine of the age, it leaves a bad flavour on the palate. Perhaps, however, Francis Adams did consciously imagine Leicester not merely as a brooding phantasm, but also as an ill-bred and selfish youth, redeemed by several brilliant qualities, and once or twice a noble trait. No one who reads this latest addition to the "Keynotes" series will fail to appreciate the truth and delicacy of the portraiture of Rosy, the young girl who gives all to Bertram Leicester in exchange for his fugitive passion. The chapter in which is described the finale of their drama is a strongly realised and moving piece of writing.

An Altar of Earth is written with brightness and skill. It turns upon a motive which would spell shipwreck to most novelists—that of the voluntary prostitution of a pure woman for what seems to her an adequate, nay an imperative, good for others. But the writer's imagination has not passed through the flame, it has merely been warmed, otherwise Thymol Monk's tale would be, instead of a clever and often effective story, a book to ponder over and to remember. As it is, the person who could write the penultimate chapter shows warrant for the belief that he will yet produce the fine work which An Altar of Earth has just missed being.

Louis Couperus, the "Sensitist," is one of the ablest of the young Hollanders. Hitherto, however, his affectations and his morbid treatment of morbid themes have obscured his genuine talent. Estasy was a subtle and clever study, but Majesty is better. It is of the class of novels of which M. Alphonse Daudet's Rois en Exil is the foremost example. Though it is impossible not to see Russia, and the rulers of Russia, in the background, we need not be too exigent in the quest of parallels. Quite apart from any fitting of the cap, the story should be read for its own sake. The character of Othomar, Crown Prince, and afterwards Orthomar XII., is drawn with searching insight and veracity. As I do not know Dutch, I cannot say whether the translation is wholly satisfactory; but this English version, by Mr. A. Teixeira de Mattos and Mr. Ernest Dowson, reads excellently.

In The Wish Miss Lily Henkel shows herself not only a scholarly, but also a pleasing, translator. So far as I know, only one of Sudermann's novels has before been translated into English—Frau Sorge, which appeared under the literal title of "Dame Care." The ablest book of the famous German author is his second, Der Katzensteg, though some of his finest work is in the series of tales collectively called Geschwister ("Brothers and Sisters"). As a novelist, however, he is not so commanding a figure as he is as a dramatist. Even Der Katzensteg, brilliant as it is, does not rank with "Die Ehre," "Sodom's Ende," and "Heimat," three plays which have won a continental reputation. Still, though The Wish is not Sudermann's masterpiece, it is a stronger and more interesting tale than Frau Sorge, and should find many readers. Most of these will doubtless enjoy Mrs. Elizabeth Lee's informing introduction.

Perhaps the most competent among this group of translators is Miss Margaret Symonds, who has signally proved her capacity for this kind of work, in her excellent rendering of Prince Schoenaich-Carolath's fine story. Melting Snows is a book which one would at once class with Björnsterne Björnson's. It is refined, subtle in its very simplicity, and convincing. It is a study of temperament: this record of the evolution of an ungainly, commonplace, and in every way unattractive youth into a poet and a passionate lover. Two slight sketches follow the story of Bent Sörenson—"The Queen of Thule" and "The Moth," both of which are distinctive in touch and skilfully wrought. Miss Symonds is, generally, as correct in her English as she is graceful; but, like more experienced writers, she comes to grief over the relativity of "only." For example, "he only noticed that winter was drawing to a close by the fact that it was very cold in his bedroom."

Neither My Indian Summer nor Candiduccia is likely to attract much attention, though both are worth reading, and each has enough of local colour to please all who are familiar with Italian life. The story by the Princess Olga Cantacuzène Altieri, which Miss Agnes Euan-Smith has translated creditably, is the better of the two in point of style and grip; but probably the pleasing discursiveness of the Marchesa Theodoli's romance will appeal to a wider number of readers. Candiduccia is, in every respect, a marked advance, in both manner and innate interest, upon Under Pressure. I do not know "Castel Rodiano"; but I am familiar with the little hill-towns of the Comarca di Roma, which are its counterpart, and can vouch for the fidelity of the Marchesa Theodoli's local and individual sketches. The writer, if I am not mistaken, is an English lady, settled in her husband's country: and so is not strictly one of my "foreign contingent."

Of the three Australian volumes, distinctly the best is Mr. Morley Roberts's Red Earth. The tales in this book are vivid, terse, and dramatic, and are free from that weary colonialism which handicaps so many books written in the Antipodes or by reminiscent Antipodeans. Mr. Andrew Robertson's Nuggets makes a fairly good second. If a public still exist which can take pleasure in more tales of the Bush, let it gratify its appetite with these two books, by all means. But surely the time is come when the boredom of these monotonously similar Australian stories must produce as definite a reaction as that which has already made the political novel and the romance of Green Erin become, if not mere memories, at least moribund. The Pilgrims is as Australian as its companions in this list; but it is without the go of Mr. Andrew Robertson's book, or the art of Mr. Morley Roberts's.

There is no one of the six stories in Mr. Thomas Nelson Page's Burial of the Guns quite so good as his masterly "Marse Chan." But every one who has enjoyed the humour and pathos of In Ole Virginia will take pleasure in this fresh series of stories of "the rebel South." The title-story, the second in this new collection, is unquestionably deserving of its distinction.

Husband and Brother has for a sub-title "A Few Chapters in a Woman's Life of To-day." "Too much girls," as someone wrote recently, à propos of the woman-plays now occupying so much room on the London stage—"too much girls" makes one suspicious of books thus heralded. But Miss St. John Conway is clever and entertaining, and shows, besides, a genuine talent. No doubt she will, in good time, give us something more thorough and more impressive, while not less deft and readable, than the two short tales in this latest addition to Arrowsmith's shilling series.

WILLIAM SHARP.

GIFT BOOKS.

Little Johannes. Translated from the Dutch of Frederik van Eeden by Clara Bell. With an introductory chapter by Andrew Lang. (Heinemann.) We are very sorry for little Johannes, still sorrier for any little boy who has to go through similar experiences before he becomes a man. For this, we take it, is the meaning of this wondrous parable or allegory which, under the guise of a fairy tale, is presented to the British public "with an introduction by Mr. Andrew Lang." We fear this introduction is but a "bait," a "bush" to bring customers to a new importation of wine not suited to the ordinary palate. Mr. Lang talks pleasantly of Märchen and Homer, and the Ojibbeways, of La Fontaine and Apuleius and Thackeray, of Perault and Mme. D'Aulnoy and the Comte de Caylus, of Kingsley, of Lewis Carroll, and Dr. Macdonald; but he tells us nothing about Frederik van Eeden or Little Johannes. He even declines to criticise the story which he introduces to the English reader. It was scarcely to be expected or desired that he should perform the office of a critic as well as a sponsor; but yet we feel sure that many would like to know what he thinks of a tale that belongs to a class which, to judge from his preface, does not greatly attract him. If he can say of Kingsley's Water-Babies that it is a "fairy tale much too full of science, and of satire not very intelligible to children, and not always entertaining to other people," what would be his opinion of Little Johannes, in which, if there is not so much science, there is more metaphysics; if not so much satire, much more discontent with the arrangements of the world? Taken merely as a story, it seems a mélange of the Water-Babies and Alice in Wonderland, of Hans Christian Andersen and Ibsen, and is well enough written to keep the attention alive. But, if we are not mistaken, all the strange adventures of little Johannes and his numerous masters—Windekind, Wistik, Dr. Cypher, Pluizer, and the rest—have a deep symbolical meaning. Why did not Mr. Lang interpret it for us? for we confess that we are unable to read the riddle unaided. Only we seem to understand that ideal beauty and happiness are not to be attained in this world; that all the guides to spiritual knowledge which we possess, including the Bible, are inadequate; that the chief glory of life is to be a true man; and that to accomplish this a child must go through a series of trials and disillusion and rackings of the mind and soul which would make him old before he is young. We are not certain that we are right even so far, and when we come to details our bewilderment is complete. Does the author mean that vivisection is to be condemned or praised? Is Dr. Cypher a medical man or a school-master? If the latter, why does he attend little Johannes' father in his last illness? If the former, why does he depute Pluizer to conduct the post-mortem? Why does Death object so strongly to post-mortems? Surely it was unkind of Mr. Lang not to give us some key to this intellectual labyrinth. Altogether, Little Johannes is a book calculated to puzzle the heads of elders to little purpose and to send clever children crazy.

The Whispering Winds and the Tales they Told. By Mary H. Debenham. (Blackie.) We wish the winds would tell us stories like these. It would be worth while to climb Primrose Hill, or even up to the giddy heights of Hampstead Heath in a bitter east wind, if we could only be sure of hearing such a sweet, sad, tender, and stirring story as that of Hilda Brave Heart, or even one that was half so good. But though this story is our favourite, the other winds have fine inventions and are well worth listening to. The south wind told Miss Debenham a sweet story about Baby Benedetta who was stolen by the Watersprites in Lago Maggiore; and the north wind filled her ear with wonder and delight as he revealed the strange history of Eva and Young Ronald; and the west wind with his tale of Humfrey and Hilary and their brave invasion of the domain of the Mist King showed equal ability as a raconteur. How Miss Debenham remembered all the winds told her is a puzzle; but there is no doubt that these stories are reported verbatim, just as they were spoken, and there is also no doubt that they are all quite true. If any one after reading them doubts that the tears of Chiara turned to pearls, or that Goody's marigolds waked the sleepers in the Misty Land, he does not know what truth is.

Betty: a Schoolgirl. By L. T. Meade. (W. & R. Chambers.) We do not believe that Mrs. St. Leger would have had such a governess as Mademoiselle, or that she would have placed her in charge of her school in her absence. Nor do we believe that she would have kept Mademoiselle for one single day after she had found out that she borrowed money from the pupils, and did not pay them. We are also incredulous as to the conduct of Mademoiselle herself. She was, no doubt, not a person of high principle; but she could scarcely have been so silly as to take the whole seven of her charges to a circus the first night after Mrs. St. Leger went away, and propose to let them all in at a back-door in order not to wake the servants. Nor would she have thought, for a moment, that she could change the poems of the girls, so that a stupid girl could get the prize without an immediate discovery. All the machinery of the story is, in fact, very poor; but, nevertheless, the girls are well drawn, and, within certain limits, the "grown-ups" also. Lotty is an excellent character; and the story is told in such a lively and agreeable manner that, in spite of all defects, it will be read (and deserves to be read also) with unflagging interest.

Toby: his Experiences and Opinions. By Ascott R. Hope. (Innes.) We are afraid that the dog Toby has been tempted by the example of Marie Bashkirtseff to give to the world an account of his life without that self-respecting veil which should shroud the meaner details of the most candid autobiography. He is not at all a good dog, and his most creditable actions appear to have been instigated only by selfish motives. Perhaps more could not have been expected of a dog of no family in particular. We have heard of thorough-bred mongrels, but we doubt if Toby ranks even as high as that. His remarks upon mankind are ignorant, impertinent, and ungrateful. He is an idle and gluttonous dog, but he has one saving quality—he is amusing, especially in the account of his youth—and some allowance is to be made for him on account of his blighted affections. We may be too hard upon Toby; but, if so, his readers, who will probably be very numerous, will be able to correct our judgment. We are accustomed to treat with more than ordinary consideration the failings of literary men, and surely we should be still kinder to a literary dog who has got into "The Dainty Book" series.

Moonbeams and Brownies. By Roma White. (Innes.) Another of the "Dainty Books" which will no doubt be welcome to many children. The author has much fancy and fun, but she allows them to run riot and gets dangerously near sheer nonsense at times. Perhaps this is a fault on the right side; and certainly the stories which are provided for children too often want that light-hearted, irresponsible invention which young folks love. Whimsical, capricious, grotesque, Miss Roma White's fancy is always bright and changeable, and never seems to tire. Nor do we think the attention of her young readers will easily tire either, as underneath the glittering surface there are many thoughts, sweet and merry, if sometimes rather mad.

The Satellite, and Other Stories. By the Hon. Eva Knatchbull-Hugessen. (Innes.) Very nice stories are these, and we should find it difficult to arrange them in the order of their merit. On the whole we think "The Satellite" deserves its priority, not perhaps on account of the story, for the incident of the fire is a little too strong—a gentler expedient would have sufficed to bring Victoria and Rosalie together—but the admirable way in which these two very different and typical natures are depicted makes this tale the strongest in the book. Yet "The Story of the Smite-Them-Hip-and-Thigh," though also rather extravagant in some of its incidents, shows the same insight into the character of young people and a wilder humour; while "Geof," the third story, is perhaps more entirely delightful than either of its predecessors. As for "Fräulein Schmidt," the fourth and last, we shall leave it to recommend itself. We do not know that these tales show any distinct advance in literary skill, for we remember some other delightful stories by the same author, which have much the same qualities and defects; but there is no doubt that she has not fallen below her former level—and that is a high one—among living writers of children's books.

Messire. By Frances E. Crompton. (Innes.) These tales are pleasant; but, on the whole, we are a little disappointed that the author of Master Bartlemy and The Gentle Heritage has not given us a greater treat this Christmas. We do not for a moment mean to say that Messire is not a very nice story, or that Brown's devotion and death are not pathetic; but we have been more moved by less artless stories, and cannot get rid of the impression that the tale is "made up." "The Wayfaring of Gluck," though more obviously an invention, is more convincing and delightful. The third story, "Pippo, Letty, and I," is nearest to probability, or rather, perhaps, to experience. We all know boys who lord it over their sisters, though they are nearly always in the wrong; and we know also how the sisters submit, not only in childhood, but through life. Nevertheless, we can scarcely forgive "Letty and I," for Pippo is such a very horrid little boy.

Five Stars in a Little Pool. By Edith Carrington. (Cassells.) These stories command our respect. They are pleasantly written, introduce us to many nice children, and their morals are unimpeachable. At the same time we have not a great admiration for a parent who sets his children special duties to perform in his absence, in order to give them an object lesson in the parable of the talents. We confess we sympathise more than we ought to do with the little boy who kept his seeds in his pocket and never cultivated his mignonette at all. The worst of it is that most of the healthy children who read the book will sympathise with him too, and think his estimable father a very stupid person. "Kind Nelly" is better than "The Little Gardeners," but still weak. "The Stolen Peaches" is better still, and contains a delightful picture of a little girl named Mattie, but the notion of Aunt Mary keeping a peach-stone set in silver in a secret drawer of her workbox to remind her for ever of a childish sin is surely a little morbid. We hope Miss Carrington will learn some day that, if she wishes to fill the minds of her young readers with good principles, the best way is not to drive them in like nails.

Topsy and Turvy. Number II. By P. S. Newell. (Fisher Unwin.) This Number II. is very like Number I., published last year, and exhibits equal ingenuity in making a drawing-book something quite different when you turn it topsy-turvy. It will provoke probably much the same amount of merriment among young people, especially those who have not enjoyed Number I. We hope, however, that Mr. Newell will find some fresh device to exercise his inventive faculty next year, as this shows some signs of getting threadbare.

Banshee Castle. By Rosa Mulholland. (Blackie.) This is a charming gift-book for girls. Lord Tyrowen, an Irish peer, marries three times. By his first wife he has a son, who quarrels with his father, and disappears in America; by his second wife he has three daughters, whom he leaves unprovided for. Their mother's old governess, Mrs. Annesley, sinks her savings in an annuity, and supports the three motherless girls, apparently even during their father's lifetime. After his death Mrs. Annesley, with her three young charges, lives in Banshee Castle, which stands in a remote part of Connaught. Here they make the acquaintance of the family of a Mr. Kirkpatrick, a very wealthy American. The eldest Miss Tyrcornell not unnaturally becomes engaged to young Mr. Kirkpatrick; and now young Lord Tyrowen appears on the scene, and tells the girls that he "will be a true and loyal brother to them." Mrs. Annesley ("Granny" as the girls call her) becomes very anxious about the style of living introduced by the new master of Banshee Castle; and, remembering what the family solicitor has told her, that young Lord Tyrowen would only have an income of £200 a year of his own, she begins to fear that Hugh (like his fathers before him) is a wastrel. The girls, however, are very happy with their newly found brother, when, in the midst of their preparations for Christmas festivities, Mr. Kirkpatrick arrives from America, where he had known young Lord Tyrowen when he was dying of consumption. He congratulates him on his recovery; but Lord Tyrowen replies that he never had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Kirkpatrick before. The consequence is that, when the two gentlemen are left alone, Mr. Kirkpatrick asks his host, "Have you, or have you not, a right to the title you assume of Lord Tyrowen?" We must refer our readers to the book itself if they wish to know how this question was answered. Banshee Castle has many merits besides that of a well-constructed plot, and can be warmly recommended.

In Press-Gang Days. By Edgar Pickering. (Blackie.) A cruel uncle, a seizure by a press-gang, voyages and fights under Nelson (including the attack on Santa Cruz and the Battle of the Nile), capture by the French, imprisonment and hairbreadth escape, a tremendous hand-to-hand fight on board a French schooner—these are only a few of the delights which await the happy boy who receives In Press-Gang Days as a Christmas present. To say that Mr. Edgar Pickering is a second Marryat would be going too far, but it is of that friend of our boyhood we think as we read this delightful story; for it is not only a story of adventure with incidents well conceived and arranged, but the characters are interesting and well-distinguished. Señor Isidore Pascal, the curiosity-dealer of Santa Cruz, who takes the hero under his care, and is his companion in many a strange and violent scene afterwards, is a true "character," well drawn; and the hero himself—Harry Waring—who tells the story, is no lay figure, but a fine, manly fellow, in whose fortunes the reader takes a personal interest. Mr. Stacey's illustrations deserve also more than a word of praise.

The Rebel Commodore. By David Lawson Johnstone. (W. & R. Chambers.) This book, compiled from memoirs of the earlier adventures ashore and afloat of Sir Ascott Dalrymple, Knight of the Bath, tells of "free trade"—as smuggling was then termed—adventures on the Solway shore in the brave times before and during the American War. The story commences in 1773, when young Ascott, aged twelve, witnessed the exciting scene between Captain Bethune and the friend of Sanders M'Culloch: the latter, master of a lugger whose crew were smugglers, had suffered the extreme penalty of the law. The various adventures are not only exciting in themselves, but are graphically described. The pages connected with Marjorie, the beautiful daughter of Captain Bethune, who was wooed and won by brave Ascott, form a pleasing contrast to those which tell of stormy scenes and daring deeds by sea and land. The illustrations, by Mr. W. Boucher, add to the interest of the book.

The Heart of the Rockies. By G. A. Henty. (Blackie.) This must be accounted one of Mr. Henty's tales of adventure rather than of history. Certainly, he gives his hero, Tom Wade, and Tom's no less adventurous uncle Harry, a gold-seeker in Colorado, a superabundance of hairbreadth escapes. They and their friends, while in search for a gold mine, are hunted by Indians, and nearly overwhelmed in snow. Their adventures, however, especially when they are paddling in a canoe through the gorges of the Rockies, give Mr. Henty an admirable opportunity of showing his descriptive powers. Both the Wades are good fellows, and even better drawn is a friendly Indian chief. Freed as he is here from the fetters of past history, and working in the field of imagination proper, Mr. Henty is seen at his best as an artist in lightning fiction.

"Lights Out!" By Robert Overton. (Jarrold.) These are stories by boys for boys, told "in the dark" by the occupants of the big dormitory at Salwey House. The idea is well conceived and well carried out—the sort of stories, "touched up," which we have heard when lights were out in our own boy-hood. "Pluck," for instance, is just what might happen to a fearless but impudent boy. Walter Quickleigh's first day at business is excellent. He distinguishes himself by serving a very irascible client of the firm with a writ, which was, of course, not intended for the client, and then shuts up the senior partner in his own safe, mistaking him for a burglar. "How Bertie Perkins got his Father into Parliament," and "A Dark Night's Work" are very true to a boy's higher and lower nature.

NOTES AND NEWS.

A WORK attributed to Abū Sālih, the Armenian, and probably dating from the first years of the thirteenth century, on "The Churches and Monasteries of Egypt and some Neighbouring Countries," will be published very shortly in English and Arabic by the Clarendon Press. The text is edited and translated by Mr. B. T. A. Evetts, of the British Museum, from the unique MS. in the National Library in Paris; and copious notes are added from the pen of Mr. Alfred J. Butler, to whose Ancient Coptic Churches of Egypt the new treatise forms a valuable supplement. The complete work will appear in the series of "Anecdota Oxoniensia"; but the translation and notes will likewise be issued separately. It will be found to throw much light on Egyptian geography, and on the religion and ecclesiastical antiquities of the Copts, as well as on the relations existing in the twelfth century between the Christians of Egypt and their Muhammadan fellow-countrymen.

THE Benchers of the Inner Temple have decided to print the MS. records of their society, dating from 1506, the twenty-second year of the reign of Henry VII., to the present time. The work will be edited by Mr. Inderwick, Q.C.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. have determined to re-issue the entire series of "English Men of Letters," in thirteen monthly volumes, each containing three of the original books. The first volume of the new issue, to appear at the end of the current week, will include Prof. Ward's Chaucer, Dean Church's Spenser, and Mr. Saintsbury's Dryden.

MESSRS. WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS will publish shortly A Study of John Stuart Mill's Moral Philosophy, by Dr. Charles Douglas, assistant to Prof. Calderwood at Edinburgh.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & Co. have in the press The Defence of Plevna, 1877, by one who took part in it—namely, Mr. William V. Herbert. The book will be furnished with maps.

MESSRS. RICHARD BENTLEY & SON announce a new book by Major Arthur T. Fisher, formerly of the Twenty-first Hussars, entitled Outdoor Life in England: a Study of Sport and Natural History.

MESSRS. W. H. ALLEN & Co. will publish on Monday next a second edition, brought up to date, of The Life and Enterprises of Ferdinand de Lesseps, by Mr. G. Barnett Smith. This is the only complete account of the great Frenchman and his work in English.

A NEW story by Mrs. Oliphant, entitled The Two Strangers, will be published next week by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

SOME of Gottfried Keller's stories, translated by Mrs. Freiligrath Kroeker, will appear in the "Independent Novel Series" under the title of Clothes Make the Man.

MR. HENRY J. DRANE is about to publish a novel, entitled A Blind Man's Love, by a new writer who calls himself Lawrence John.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK announces a series of essays on the ethical value of Tennyson's writings, by Mr. John Oates, entitled The Teachings of Tennyson.

THE first number of a new series of Little Folks, to be published on December 20, will contain the first chapters of two serial stories, "True to His Colours," by Col. Percy Groves, and "Playmates," by L. T. Meade, and also the facsimile of a letter written by the Queen at the age of nine years. Little Folks will enter on its twenty-fourth year with this number, with which will be presented a separate book of songs for young people, with music.

THE seven-page elegy in the Westminster Review for December is by Mr. John Walker, who writes under the pseudonym of Rowland Thirlmere. The poem is entitled "Sepulchrum Dulcissimi Cantoris" (In Memory of John Keats); and its motive is a belief in the theory that the souls of the dead have immortality upon the earth in some beautiful but unimaginable form.

THE twenty-first meeting of the North Midland Library Association was held at the Midland Railway Institute, Derby, on December 6. This was well attended, interesting and practical. Ten new members were elected. The next meeting will be held at Leicester in February.

A CONVERSAZIONE of the Jewish Historical Society will be held in the St. James's Hall Restaurant on Sunday next, at 8 p.m., when the Rev. F. L. Cohen will deliver short addresses, with vocal and instrumental illustrations, on "Hebrew Melody in the Concert-Room" and "Some Anglo-Jewish Song-Writers."

MR. R. B. HALDANE will deliver an address on "Hegel," as president of the Ethical Society, on Sunday next, at 7.30 p.m., in Essex Hall, Strand.

THE following are the lecture arrangements at the Royal Institution after Christmas: Prof. J. A. Fleming, six lectures (adapted to a juvenile auditory) on "The Work of an Electric Current"; Prof. Charles Stewart, twelve lectures on "The Internal Framework of Plants and Animals"; Mr. William Samuel Lily, four lectures on "The English Humorists of the Nineteenth Century"; Mr. L. Fletcher, three lectures on "Meteorites"; Dr. Samuel Rawson Gardiner, three lectures on "Three Periods of Seventeenth Century History"—(1) The Monarchy, (2) the Commonwealth, (3) the Restoration; Dr. E. B. Tylor, two lectures on "Animism"; Mr. Lewis F. Day, three lectures on "Stained Glass Windows, and Painted Glass from the point of view of Art and Craftsmanship"; Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, three lectures on "Hänsel and Gretel," an opera by E. Humperdinck (with musical illustrations). The Friday evening meetings will commence on January 18, when Prof. Dewar will deliver a discourse on "Phosphorescence and Photographic Action at the Temperature of Boiling Liquid Air." Succeding discourses will probably be given by Sir Colin Scott-Moncrieff, Mr. Henry Irving, Dr. G. Sims Woodhead, Mr. Clinton T. Dent, Prof. A. Schuster, Prof. A. W. Rücker, Prof. Roberts-Austen, Prof. H. E. Armstrong, and Lord Rayleigh.

THE library of the late Edmund Yates will be put up to auction at Sotheby's towards the end of January. The chief interest of the collection arises from its owner's connexion with Dickens. Here may be found the desk which Dickens used on the very day of his death, twenty-four of his letters to Yates, books from his library with his book-plate, and presentation copies of his own works with autograph inscriptions. Another lot not wholly dissociated from Dickens is the pamphlet of "Facts and Correspondence" relating to the historic quarrel at the Garrick Club.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE last number of the Oxford University Gazette prints nine columns of amendments to the proposed statute establishing degrees for research, which will be considered in Congregation early next term. The most important suggestions made are: (1) to assimilate the new degree to the ordinary B.A.; (2) to substitute the existing boards of faculties for the proposed special delegacy; (3) to define more precisely what is intended by "a good general education"; and (4) to reduce the term of residence required from three years to two years.

CONVOCAION at Durham has adopted a petition to the crown for a new charter, empowering the university to grant degrees to women in all faculties except divinity, and also authorising Convocation to be held at Newcastle.

PROF. J. H. MIDDLETON—whose term as Slade professor of fine art at Cambridge will shortly expire—has been elected an honorary fellow of King's.

MR. MATTHEW DAVENPORT HILL, of New College—who bears an honoured name—has been elected by the delegates of the common university fund to a biological scholarship at the Naples marine laboratory.

THE Walsingham medal, given by the High Steward at Cambridge for biology, has been awarded to Mr. I. H. Burkill, of Caius.

MR. I. GOLLANCZ, of Christ's College, has been appointed chairman of the examiners for the mediæval and modern languages tripos at Cambridge. It happens that Mr. Gollancz is also one of the two examiners in English at the London University.

GRANTS of books printed at the Cambridge University Press have been made to the following public libraries: Christ Church, Southwark; Kilburn; Hull; Chiswick; Bromley, Kent; the Nicholson Institute, Leek; Gravesend; and Willesden Green.

THE Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge has made a grant of £5,000 towards the endowment fund of King's College, London.

Two academical books are announced for immediate publication in America. One is Four American Universities: namely, Harvard, Yale, Princeton, and Columbia, described by Profs. Charles Eliot Norton, A. T. Hadley, W. M. Sloane, and Brander Matthews, who are (with one exception) graduates of the institutions about which they write, as well as professors. The other is a translation of Prof. Paulsen's elaborate work on German Universities, by Prof. E. D. Perry, with an introduction, contrasting the German and American systems.

THE only fault that could be alleged against the Catalogue of Cambridge Books, published early in the year by Messrs. Macmillan & Bowes, was the absence of an index, which made it difficult to consult. This fault has now been repaired by the issue of an independent volume, of sixty-seven pages, containing a full index of both authors and subjects, under one alphabet. The author, if a Cambridge man, has his college assigned to him; the names of the contributors to volumes of collections are separately entered; and some of the articles—such as Henry Bradshaw and John E. B. Mayor—are almost of the nature of bibliographies. We may mention that Messrs. Macmillan & Bowes brought together an immense collection of books and pamphlets for the object of compiling this catalogue, and that they would now be glad to dispose of the whole, or of special sections of it, on favourable terms. The chief rarity seems to be Linacre's translation of the De Temperamentis of Galen, printed at Cambridge by Siberch in 1521.

VIRELAY.

If thou ask me why I love her,
I will answer thee:
"Seeing her, thou wilt discover
All the mystery;
And not ask me why I love her."

For, if thou my mistress see,
Thou, as I do, wilt adore her;
And thy only question be,
"Who that would not bow before her?
Seeing she is such as she."

JAMES L. THORNELY.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

DR. WILLIAM SPARROW SIMPSON has acquired some of the visitation books of the Diocese of London for the year 1738, from which he gives in the Antiquary for December a series of extracts, showing that the state of things in the Established Church in the earlier years of the last century has been but little exaggerated by its foes. Of morals, using the word in its more restricted sense, we hear little, but of non-residence and neglect there is much to tell. In one church the communion had not been administered for fifty years, except on a solitary occasion when it was given on a certain Good Friday. The non-resident ecclesiastics plead bad air and ague as an excuse for not doing their work. Did not these things affect the curates also? Mr. J. Lewis André communicates a very good account of the old punishment of pressing to death those who stood mute and refused to plead when indicted for felony. It seems that this brutality succeeded one worse than itself because more lingering: in the earlier time these unhappy people were starved to death. The papers on window-glass making and on Lancashire religious ministers during the Puritan time are interesting. Both writers fully understand the subjects of which they treat.

THE NEW SCHOOL OF ENGLISH AT OXFORD.

THE Board of Studies for the Final Honour School of English Language and Literature at Oxford have issued the following Regulations for 1896 and 1897:—

The subjects of examination in this School are—

- I. Portions of English Authors.
- II. The History of the English Language.
- III. The History of English Literature.
- IV. (In the case of those Candidates who aim at a place in the First or Second Class) a Special Subject of Language or Literature.

I. ENGLISH AUTHORS.

Candidates will be examined in the following texts:—

Beowulf.
The texts printed in Sweet's Anglo-Saxon Reader.
King Horn.
Havelok.
Laurence Minot.
Sir Gawain and the Green Knight.
Chaucer's Canterbury Tales: the Prologue and the following Tales:—The Knight's, The Man of Law's, The Prioress's, Sir Thopas, The Monk's, The Nun's Priest's, The Pardoner's, The Clerk's, The Squire's, The Second Nun's, The Canon's Yeoman's.

Piers Plowman: the Prologue and first seven passus (text B).

Shakspeare, with a special study of the following Plays: Love's Labour's Lost, Romeo and Juliet, Richard II., Twelfth Night, Julius Caesar, Winter's Tale, King Lear.

Bacon's Essays.

Milton, with a special study of Paradise Lost and the Areopagitica.

Dryden's Essay on Epic.

Pope's Satires and Epistles.

Johnson's Lives of the Poets: the Lives of Eighteenth Century Poets.

Goldsmith's Citizen of the World.

Burke's Thoughts on the Present Discontents.

Lyrical Ballads (Wordsworth and Coleridge).

Shelley's Adonais.

These texts are to be studied (1) with reference to the forms of the language; (2) as examples of literature; and (3) in their relation to the history and thought of the period to which they belong.

II. HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

Candidates will be examined in the Philology and History of the Language, in Gothic (the Gospel of St. Mark), and in Translation from Old English and Middle English authors not specially offered.

III. HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

The examination will include the History of Criticism and of style in prose and verse.

IV. SPECIAL SUBJECTS.

Candidates who aim at a place in the First or Second Class will be expected to offer a Special Subject, which may be chosen from the following list:—

1. Old English language and literature down to 1150 A.D.
2. Middle English language and literature, 1150-1400 A.D.
3. Old French Philology, with special reference to Anglo-Norman French, together with a special study of the following texts:—Computus of Philippe de Thaurin, Voyage of St. Brandan, The Song of Dermot and the Earl, Les Contes Moraux de Nicole Bozon.
4. Scandinavian Philology, with special reference to Icelandic, together with a special study of the following texts:—Gylfaginning, Laxdaela Saga, Gunnlaugsaga Ormstungu.
5. French literature down to 1400 A.D. in its bearing on English literature.
6. Italian literature as influencing English literature down to the death of Milton.
7. English literature, 1400-1558 A.D.
8. German literature from 1500 A.D. to the death of Goethe in its bearing on English literature.
9. Elizabethan literature, 1558-1637 A.D.
10. English literature, 1637-1700 A.D.
11. English literature, 1700-1745 A.D.
12. English literature, 1740-1797 A.D.
13. Wordsworth and his contemporaries, 1797-1850 A.D.
14. History of Scottish poetry.

Candidates who desire to offer any other subject or period as a Special Subject must obtain the leave of the Board of Studies a year before the Examination.

Candidates who offer a period of English Literature will be expected to show a competent knowledge of the History, especially the Social History, of England during such period.

The following scheme of papers is contemplated:—

1. Beowulf and other Old English texts.
2. King Horn, Havelok, Minot, Sir Gawain.
3. Chaucer and Piers Plowman.
4. Shakspeare.
5. Milton—Bacon—Dryden.
6. Authors from 1700-1832 A.D.
7. History of the language.
8. Gothic—O.E. and M.E. translations.
9. History of the literature.
10. } Special Subjects.
11. }

"GIOVANNI BOCCACCIO AS MAN AND AUTHOR."
BY JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS. (NIMMO.)

London: Dec. 10, 1894.

My attention has been called to the fact that I have caused pain to Mr. Nimmo by some remarks made at the beginning of my review of this book. I am very sorry to hear it, and willingly give Mr. Nimmo, and any other persons concerned, the explanation which is their due.

I must begin by saying that, although I never saw him, Mr. Symonds had corresponded with me at some length, and had given me much sympathetic help. I have profited much by many of his books, and have more than once said so in the ACADEMY. When, therefore, I considered this particular book, I was unwilling to believe that Mr. Symonds had himself authorised its publication, and had made himself responsible for it as it stands. I felt, if I may say so, inclined to "protect" Mr. Symonds's memory. When, for instance, I said that he could not have "authorised the scissor and paste work" of which it bore signs, I meant that he would not be likely to have copied into it passages out of former books. "Scissor and paste" is a vulgarity for which I am willing to ask pardon. Of its meaning, as I used it, there can surely be little question. It was intended to imply that the book did repeat passages in eadem verbis, or by way of paraphrase, from former books—in particular, from the second and fourth volumes of the Renaissance.

But when I learn that the book is actually a holograph in Mr. Symonds's script—begun and ended and finally revised by him—I have nothing more to say, but that I am sorry I touched on the matter at all. I wished to speak reverently of Mr. Symonds, and I find that I have injured his publisher and his literary executor. To these gentlemen I offer this explanation, which I hope they will admit to be candid. Nothing will alter my opinion of the book; but I can at least assure those in whose disposition it is that I perfectly accept their statement of facts, and correct mine by it.

MAURICE HEWLETT.

Exeter College, Oxford: Dec. 8, 1894.

It is well known that those who have written upon this subject agree for the most part in finding corrections of an Ebionite character in Cod. Sin. These corrections, it is supposed, are only partial. Side by side with them remain readings which assert strongly the superhuman birth of our Lord; and the result of the juxtaposition of the two different types of readings is a strangely inconsistent narrative. Mr. Charles would go further than this. St. Matthew i. 1-17 is "an Ebionitic genealogy of Jesus—wrongly prefixed by the final redactor of the Gospel." "In i. 18-25 (which belongs organically to the First Gospel) we have an account of the superhuman birth." Yet even in these verses "we must reject, both on internal and external grounds, the Ebionitic readings." All such explanations create more difficulties than they solve.

And, after all, is the supposed inconsistency so great as it seems? Much that appears difficult to us may be due to our looking at the facts from our modern standpoint, and not from that of the early Christians. If we take the text of Cod. Sin. as it stands, a little consideration will make it clear that there is nothing really unnatural about it. And, further, it will be found that this text provides us with an explanation of the variant readings in this narrative, which are found in the Greek MSS. in the Old Latin and in the other Syriac Versions.

(a) The account of the Nativity in Cod. Sin. is homogeneous and consistent. Let us notice how, throughout the section, terms of human relationship are used of the Holy Family—"Joseph begat Jesus" (v. 16); Joseph is the husband of Mary (v. 19); Mary is the wife of Joseph (vv. 20, 24); Mary bears a son to Joseph (vv. 21, 25); lastly, Joseph exercises paternal right in giving the child his name.

So far, the language used has been that of everyday family life. But it is impossible to misjudge the writer, so carefully does he guard his language from misconception. At the very moment when, from a legal standpoint, it might be said that "Joseph begat Jesus," Mary was, as a matter of fact, still a virgin (v. 16). Further, at the time of the conception of her child there had been no intercourse between the so-called husband and wife "before they approached one to the other" (v. 18). And the writer sees in this a fulfilment of the prophetic saying that a virgin should conceive (Is. vii. 14, cf. v. 22).

In all this it is impossible to see two theologically different conceptions of the Nativity of our Lord striving to oust one another from the text. The threads of the narrative are too finely woven to be so rudely handled, and, on the other hand, the simplicity and directness of the terms used of Joseph's paternity would seem to carry us back to the first days of the Christian Church.

But it will be said that it would be impossible for a writer who believed in the Virgin-birth to use the phrase "Joseph begat—Jesus." Why should we not use it? We have so long been accustomed to phrases like the following:

- St. Matt. i. 19. Joseph her husband;
" " 20. Mary thy wife;
" " 24. took unto him his wife;
St. Luke ii. 33. His father and his mother;
" " 41. His parents;
" " 48. Thy father and I;

that we find no difficulty in them, nor try to explain them away as Ebionite interpolations. And yet the difficulty in these phrases is not really less than that involved in "Joseph begat—Jesus." If there be a difference, it is a difference in degree, not in kind. Surely a writer who wished to trace the Davidic descent of our Lord would see no difficulty from the legal point of view in the latter phrase; and, having used it once, the other phrases would seem natural enough where he was speaking of Joseph and his family from a social standpoint, always remembering that the idea of the Virginal-conception underlies his whole narrative, and that these naturalistic phrases are meant to be interpreted in the light of it.

(b) Not only, however, is the account in Cod. Sin. consistent and straightforward, but its readings form the source and fountain-head to which the variant readings in the Greek MSS. and the Versions can be traced back.

It was not unnatural that some of the language in Cod. Sin. should seem liable to misunderstanding, and later copyists and translators have consequently modified some of its expressions. We can trace such modifications in Syriac, in Latin, and in Greek.

I.—SYRIAC.

Of all such correctors the scribe of the Curetonian is the most thoroughgoing. His modifications are given below:

- V. 16. Sin. Jacob begat Joseph. Joseph, to whom was espoused Mary the Virgin (or a virgin), begat Jesus, who is called Messiah.
Cur. Jacob begat Joseph, he to whom was espoused Mary the Virgin (or a virgin), she who bare Jesus the Messiah.
V. 19. Sin. Joseph then her husband.
Cur. Omits "her husband."
V. 20. Sin. Thy wife.
Cur. Thy espoused.
V. 25. Sin. And she bare to him a son, and he called his name Jesus.
Cur. And lived purely with her until she bare the son, and she called his name Jesus.

It is noticeable how, once or twice, the older reading survives in the Curetonian, where we might have expected it to be modified. Thus v. 21: "Shall bear to thee"; v. 24: "And took his wife."

When we reach the Peshitta, the narrative has in the more important verses undergone radical change.

- V. 16. Jacob begat Joseph the husband of Mary, from whom was begotten Jesus who is called Messiah.
V. 21. Omits "to thee."
V. 24. "And took Mary" for "and took his wife."
V. 25. And knew her not until she bare her firstborn son, and she called his name Jesus.

But here, too, as compared with the Curetonian, traces of the older reading survive.

- V. 16. Who is called (Cur. omits).
 19. Joseph then her husband (Cur. omits "her husband").
 20. Sin. Thy wife.
 Cur. Thy espoused.
 Pesh. Thy wife.
 21. Sin. And thou shalt call his name.
 Cur. And his name shall be called.
 Pesh. And thou shalt call his name.
 23. Sin. And they shall call his name.
 Cur. And his name shall be called.
 Pesh. And they shall call his name.

II.—LATIN.

In several Old Latin MSS. we find v. 16 modified.

- k reads Cui desponsata virgo M. genuit Iesum Christum.
 d „ Cui desponsata virgo M. peperit Christum Iesum.
 b „ Cui desponsata erat virgo M., virgo autem M. genuit Iesum Christum.
 c „ Cui desponsata virgo M., M. autem genuit Iesum qui dicitur Christus.
 q „ Cui desponsata M. genuit Iesum qui vocatur Christus.
 g¹ „ Cui desponsata virgo M. genuit I. qui vocatur Christus.
 a „ Cui desponsata virgo M. genuit I. qui dicitur Christus.

III.—GREEK.

In v. 16. Codd. 13-69-346 give a rendering very like that of the Curetonian and the seven Old Latin MSS. just referred to: ἡ μνηστευθεῖσα παρθένος Μαρίας ἐγέννησεν Ἰησοῦν τὸν λεγόμενον Χριστόν.

The great mass of Greek MSS. read Ἰακώβ δὲ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰωσήφ τὸν ἀνδρα Μαρίας ἐξ ἧς ἐγεννήθη Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγόμενος Χριστός.

In v. 25. ὁὖν is read by N, B, Z, i. 33.
τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ τὸν πρωτότοκον by C, D, F, K, L, al. pler.

To sum up:

- The account of the Nativity in Cod. Sin. is homogeneous and consistent throughout.
- It presupposes throughout the miraculous conception of our Lord.
- It may be regarded as the source from which variant readings in other texts took their rise.
- It is a striking example of the very great value of the new codex both for textual critics and for theologians.

In conclusion, it may be well to add that I have not written at the impulse of any theological prepossession. What we want is not an explanation of the account of the Nativity in Cod. Sin. which can be forced into harmony with orthodox opinion, but an explanation which will account for all the facts.

The interpretation of the text for which I have pleaded seems to me to be at once simpler than any other theory that has yet appeared, and to cover the facts more completely.

WILLOUGHBY C. ALLEN.

London: December 10, 1894.

"Jettison the genealogy," suggests Mr. Charles, curiously reversing the old Tübingen view, that the virgin-birth is an accretion, and the genealogy original. But whether it is Matt. i. 1-17 that is sacrificed or i. 18-ii., the same objection applies—viz., that the separated sections show considerable signs of affinity. (1) The angel's address to Joseph, "Thou son of David," requires the previous genealogy. (2) So does the reference, "born king of the Jews." (3) The excision of three generations in the genealogy, so that the number of generations may divide into fourteens, connects itself with the strange treatment of prophecy that follows. (4) The mention of women in the genealogy, needless for Davidic descent, premonishes that some peculiar importance will attach to Christ's mother; and the particular character of the women chosen premonishes further that Christ's mother will be conspicuous in contrast. (5) There is no trace whatever in Matt. i. 16 of the reading ἐκ τῆς Μαρίας, requisite if the intention had been to represent Mary as mother in the same sense as Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, Bathsheba. (6) The tone of the angel's address, "Scruple not to take," and the injunction, "Thou shalt call," point in the same direction as the genealogy. (7) There is a connexion, noted by Mr. Conybeare, between Matt. i. 18, "Now the γέννησις (v.l. γένεσις) was on this wise," and the genealogical language precedent. (8) The combination of Joseph's fatherhood and the virgin-birth is paralleled in Luke i. 5-ii.; and it may be added that there the phenomena can only be dissociated by wrenching all the text in shreds.

Such, then, is the case for the integrity of Matt. i. ii. Nor is it weakened in the slightest degree by the readings of the Lewis Codex; for though, in some respects, the new authority emphasises Joseph's fatherhood more strongly than the received text, it also, with its additions, "virgin" and "espoused," in Matt. i. 16, emphasises more strongly the miraculous conception. No, it was not "an enemy," nor was it a friend, who has caused these textual divergencies. One scribe thought it well to assure his readers against any suspicion of impurity in connexion with the unborn Christ, by an explicit statement that Joseph had no knowledge of Mary during her pregnancy; another, mindful that Joseph and Mary were righteous and pure, preferred to leave that fact implied. It was all a question of literary taste; and the Lewis Codex only heightens colours already clear. "Son of a virgin and of Joseph" only increases a suspicion that there may be more harmonies in the Gospels than are known to commentators.

The solitary argument (Irish MSS. aside) for a cleavage between Matt. i. 1-17 and i. 18-ii. is the supposed incompatibility between Joseph's fatherhood and virgin-conception; and it has already been pointed out in the ACADEMY (November 17) that this argument loses its validity as soon as we study the systems of physiology prevalent at the time that our protevangelists were composed. In very fact, the systems then prevalent have influenced our New Testament writers all through. Thus, for example, that strange statement in Philippians ii. 6, that Christ was "in the form of God" receives its adequate explanation when we realise that, according to the Aristotelian doctrine, a father contributed no matter whatever in conception, but that it was his function to contribute μυρρὴ. Similarly, that violent insistence in 1 John v. 6-8, that Christ came not by water only, but also by blood; and that emphatic assertion in John xix. 34, 35, that from the dead Christ's body there flowed blood and water, receive their adequate explanation when we realise that, according to the Aristotelian doctrine, death was literally a reversal of conception, and that the decomposition of the blood into serum and fibrin was a veritable resolution into the original elements of conception—"a running back," so Aristotle expressed it, "from the goal to the barrier." And, coming down to the actual matter in point, and viewing Matt. i. ii., Luke i. 5-ii. in the light not of Greek doctrine, but of the ordinary Jewish, we can see that the authors not only were justified in combining the ideas which have appeared antagonistic, but really had no option. For from such passages as Heb. vii. 10 and Rev. xii. 17, also from the authorities cited in Bergel's Medicine of the Talmud (p. 68, etc.), and in Hamburger's Encyclopaedia of the Talmud (vol. ii., p. 229)—references kindly given me by Dr. Neubauer and Dr. Reich—it is evident that the Jews, making a very natural mistake, regarded a child as the product of two seeds, different in character—the father's and the mother's. From a father's seed, so taught the Rabbis, came all the light parts of the body—e.g., bones and nails—from a mother's seed all the dark parts. Thus, the eye came from both parents—the pupil from one, the white from the other. Whence, then, in a case of virgin conception, could the male element have been derived? The full consequences of any other view than that which must have been conveyed to contemporary Jewish readers by Matthew and Luke have never been properly faced. True, that to us, to-day, under the shadow of eighteen centuries, the idea of a virgin father appears strange. But it was already familiar to those whom our protevangelists addressed. This is shown clearly by the passages from Philo quoted by Mr. Conybeare—"God visits Sarah in her solitude [i.e., when Abraham is at a distance], and she brings forth not to Him who so visited her, but to Abraham"; "the legislator does not represent Abraham as knowing his wife."

In fine, the physiological argument leads us to expect the phenomena which both Matt. i. ii., Luke i. 5-ii. present; and these phenomena can only be separated by great violence to the text. God took from Joseph's loins: ὁ παρθένος ἐγέννησε.

F. P. BADHAM.

CONCERNING DEFOE'S CHARACTER.

Groningen, Netherlands.

In a letter in the ACADEMY of March 14, 1891, I showed that Defoe must have read Mary Astell's Serious Proposal to the Ladies (1694) before he composed his chapter on female education, contained in his Essay on Projects (1697), though he expressly states in his Preface that he wrote that part of his book "long before" Mary Astell's work "was made public." Thereupon Mr. S. W. Carruthers, who "as a Presbyterian" was interested in Defoe, published a reply in defence of that author in the ACADEMY of March 28, though "with diffidence." He found it hard not to trust an "express denial" of Defoe's. But instead of trying to refute my two arguments, he simply showed that Mary Astell's and Defoe's schemes were not the same. This is, of course, a fact for which no proof is needed; and as Mr. Carruthers' letter contains nothing else, I do not think that it would in the least influence the opinion of any careful reader of my previous letter. Nevertheless, a further illustration of the value of Defoe's "express denials" may be acceptable to many.

In the ACADEMY for October 13, 1894, I communicated my discovery of a new work of Defoe's, which will be published shortly by Mr. David Nutt. At the end of this treatise, entitled Of Royall Education, Defoe appears to be afraid "that it threatens a pointed satire at [his] own times and . . . at the particular conduct of families and persons, some of whom are too much above [him], and who ought not to be mark't out by the undutifull hints of any hand without doors."

Defoe wrote this passage in or about the year 1728, and the persons whose "particular conduct" was open to criticism were George II. and his father. Now, in order to avoid the suspicion that he was writing

"a pointed satire," he added that he was prepared to "show and prove, too, if need be, that these sheets [were] written many years ago, and were design'd to be publish'd during the life of Her Late Majesty Queen Ann and before Her Majesty's accession to the crown—viz., while the Duke of Gloucester was alive, and for whom the whole scheme was intended."

This would be before July, 1699, when the Duke of Gloucester died. But that his bold assertion is wrong is evident from several passages in the work itself, where he mentions, and quotes from, White Kennet's Complete History of England, the first edition of which appeared in 1706. And on closer examination of Defoe's remarks, we cannot avoid the conclusion that his misrepresentation again is not simply an error, but a deliberate falsehood. Of course, it would be possible for a man to err when giving the date of a work which he wrote "many years" before. But it is evident that Defoe must be purposely distorting the truth when he feigns to remember that "the whole scheme was intended for the Duke of Gloucester," or makes such impossible statements as this—namely, that he can "show and prove, too, if need be, that these sheets written, and design'd to be publish'd . . . before Queen Ann's accession to the crown," &c. These, as well as other remarks on fol. 99 of the MS., do not allow of a lenient interpretation.

The result is, after all, only a fresh corroboration of the opinion expressed by the late Prof. Minto on pp. 2 and 169 of his biography of Defoe—namely, that "we can hardly believe a word that Defoe says about himself without independent confirmation"; "he was a great, a truly great liar, perhaps the greatest liar that ever lived." As it has lately appeared that even serious students of his writings doubt this, I venture to think that fresh proofs for an old opinion may not be superfluous.

KARL D. BÜLBRING.

SCRIVENER'S "PLAIN INTRODUCTION TO THE TEXTUAL CRITICISM OF THE NEW TESTAMENT,"
Oxford: Dec. 4, 1894.

Will you allow me to say that an Appendix to each volume of the fourth edition of Scrivener's Plain Introduction, containing additions and corrections, can be had by possessors of the book gratis from Messrs. George Bell & Sons, through their respective booksellers?

Lists of this character are inevitable, and on publication I looked forward to the preparation of such as are now issued. Dr. Gregory has twelve similar pages at the end of his Prolegomena, besides three at the beginning; Dr. Scrivener devoted several pages in his third edition to this purpose, and it would have been well if he had devoted more.

Additions, which readers may be glad to keep by them, have grown since this edition appeared. Most of the corrections are of faults occurring in the earlier editions, some are due to my authorities, and I have myself to answer for more than I should have had on account of three illnesses which interrupted my work, besides difficulties arising from narrowness of space and the limitations of time imposed upon me by the necessities of the case and by my duty to Dean Burgon's remains.

That catalogues of MSS. existing in all sorts of places need continual correction is shown by the number of alterations suggested by M. Samuel Berger in the work of the Rev. H. J. White, which is deserving of all praise, and which M. Berger himself had corrected previously. I can, in these matters, discover no perfect accuracy—not even in the confident criticism of my critics.

An exaggerated charge has been brought against me of having neglected the "American Notes." In point of fact, my first care, after inserting Dr. Scrivener's own marginal and other corrections, was spent during more than six weeks upon these with the help of a copy kindly lent me by a neighbour, when a well-known bookseller had failed in getting one. Unfortunately, I was obliged to return the copy before I had done with the Greek MSS., which were treated last of all.

My thanks are due for suggested corrections to Dr. Bernard, in the Hermathena for this year; to M. Berger, in the Bulletin Critique for October 15; to Mr. H. C. Hoskier, the author of the admirable Collation of Evan. 604 with Appendices, in private communications; to the reviewer in the Church Quarterly for October; and to the reviewer in the Guardian for his corrections—and for his mistakes.

Dr. Pusey, in cataloguing MSS. lying before him, often envied bricklayers: I have had frequently a fellow-feeling with him.

EDWARD MILLER.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

- SUNDAY, Dec. 16, 4 p.m. Sunday Lecture: "The Use of the Supernatural in Art," by Mr. Wyke Bayliss.
7.30 p.m. Ethical: Presidential Address, "Hegel," by Mr. E. B. Haldane.
- MONDAY, Dec. 17, 5 p.m. London Institution: "Twenty Thousand Feet above the Sea," by Mr. E. Whympster.
8 p.m. Aristotelian: Symposium, "The Freedom of the Will," by Dr. W. L. Gildes, Mr. H. Sturt, and Mr. W. H. Fairbrother.
8 p.m. Society of Arts: Cantor Lecture, "Modern Developments in Explosives," IV., by Prof. Vivian B. Lewes.
- TUESDAY, Dec. 18, 4.45 p.m. Statistical: "Alien Immigration," by Mr. Geoffrey Dyer.
8 p.m. Civil Engineers: Discussion, "Colliery Surface-Works," by Mr. E. W. Wain.
- WEDNESDAY, Dec. 19, 7.30 p.m. Meteorological: "Report of the International Committee on the Cloud Atlas," by Mr. Robert H. Scott; "Rainfall and Floods in the Catchment Basins of the Severn, Wye, and Usk, November, 1894," by Mr. Henry Southall; "Meteorological Observations at Mojangar, Madagascar, 1892-1894," by Mr. S. C. Knott.
8 p.m. Geological: "The Lower Greensand above the Atherfield Clay of East Surrey," by Mr. Thomas Leighton; "The Eastern Limits of the Yorkshire and Derbyshire or Midland Coalfield," and "Some Phases of the Structure and Peculiarities of the Iron Ores of the Lake Superior Region," by Mr. W. S. Greeley.
8 p.m. Society of Arts: "Forestry," by Gen. J. Michael.
- THURSDAY, Dec. 20, 4.30 p.m. Historical: "Exploration under Elizabeth," by Mr. C. Raymond Beazley.
6 p.m. London Institution: "The Ideal Woman of the Poets," by the Dean of Ely.
8 p.m. Linnean: "The Spinning Glands in Phrynos," by Mr. H. M. Bernard; "Monocotyledonous Saprophytes," by Mr. Percy Groom.
8 p.m. Chemical: "An Improved Form of Barometer," by Dr. W. Collie; "The Chemical Constituents of Piper Ovatum," and "The Active Constituents by the Pelletory of Medicine," by Prof. Dunstan and Mr. H. Garnett; "The Preparation of Adipic Acid," by Dr. W. H. Ince.

SCIENCE.

PHILOLOGICAL BOOKS.

Race and Language. By André Lefèvre. (Kegan Paul & Co.) We cannot speak very favourably of this new work on ethnology and philology. There are so many books on the subject in the English language, some of which have acquired a high reputation, that a fresh one must justify its appearance by presenting the reader with the latest results of philological and ethnological science. But Prof. Lefèvre's book is neither accurate nor up to the present level of knowledge. Thus, in philology the author is still at the point of view which regarded the primitive Indo-European alphabet as containing only three vowels: so far as he is concerned, Brugmann, Collitz, Schmidt, and Fick have worked in vain. Modern comparative Indo-European philology is a thing unknown. So, again, we are told (p. 244) that Armenian belongs to the Iranian group of languages, a statement which shows how little Prof. Lefèvre can be acquainted with the present position of Indo-European philology. After this it is not surprising to find him asserting (p. 250) that the Cimmerians (mis-spelt Cimerians) are the "Cymri," by whom he means the Cymry—a name which appeared in Britain for the first time after the departure of the Roman legions; and that the Tel-el-Amarna Tablets contain letters from the kings of "Armenia." Whenever he touches upon Assyriology he seems to be specially unfortunate. It will be new to Assyriologists to learn that the Assyrians once penetrated to the Troad, that at Van there are "trilingual inscriptions, of which a column may perhaps enlighten us as to the early forms of Georgian," that "the deplorable cuneiform character" was "adopted by the Hittites of Syria [and] by the Cypriotes," or that "Schmidt" has "discovered" the Sumerian language of primaeva Chaldaea. Has the professor confounded the Indo-European philologist, Johannes Schmidt, with the dead Irish scholar, Dr. Hincks? A page or two further on Hincks is mentioned along with Fox Talbot, who is divided into two personalities, Fox and Talbot, though this is probably a typographical error. Still more unfortunate are the professor's essays in Semitic philology. Semitic scholars will be inclined to close the book at once when they read that in "Shem it is difficult not to recognise" Samas, the Sun-god; that "Ham was Khemos" (the professor means Kemosh), "and perhaps identical with the Egyptian Khem"; and that "Noah is a Semitic god of great antiquity, Nouach, a genius with four outspread wings, God and saviour, the spouse of Tihavti, the fecundity of the abyss." The latter statements will be new to Semitists and Assyriologists, who will be very glad to learn where the author has discovered them. As for his ideas about linguistic palaeontology, they have hardly advanced beyond those of Pictet. Otto Schrader's work is apparently unknown to him. And as regards ethnology, a professor of anthropology ought to have known better than to say that the Saxons and Jutes "drove the ancient inhabitants" of Britain "as far as the Severn and the Welsh mountains." In a book written for English readers such ignorance of the recent work of English anthropologists is inexcusable. The book, however, is an anachronism: thirty years ago it might have been up to date; to-day we devoutly hope that British readers will receive it with a large grain of salt.

Geschichte des ebräischen Zeitalters. Vol. I. By Carl Niebuhr. (Berlin: Nauck.) We have to be thankful for small mercies now-a-days, and it is something that the author of this history does not disbelieve in the existence of an ancient Hebrew age. It is much more that he has sought the aid of oriental archaeology in reconstructing the history of the past. But his method is purely "subjective," and the acceptance or rejection of a narrative is entirely dependent on the arbitrary decision of a young German student who has plainly had no experience of life in the East. The value of his criticism, whether of the Old Testament or of the Assyrian and Egyptian inscriptions, may be judged by a few examples. The historical character of the annals of Sargon of Akkad and his son Naram-Sin is denied, in unlucky ignorance of the monuments recently discovered by the Americans at Nuffar. Septicism is fairly safe in the case of the Old Testament, where its negations are not so capable of disproof; but it is dangerous to apply it to the monumental records of antiquity, where it may be tested at any moment by a new discovery. But when we find Mr. Niebuhr identifying Noah with Dionusos, and declaring him to be an agricultural deity and the "predecessor" of Yahveh, when Manoh, the father of Samson, is stated to be "no other than Noah," when Magog is identified with Mazaka and Maeonia, and Caphtor is explained as a compound of the "Semitic word Hor 'hill,'" neither the Biblical student nor the Assyriologist need be much afraid of his criticisms. It is a pity, however, that such should be the case, as there is a good deal in the volume which is original and stimulating, and the author is not afraid of starting bold and comprehensive theories, though the dogmatic tone in which they are announced is not likely to attract converts.

Tricolitanisch-tunisische Beduinenlieder. By Hans Stumme. (Leipzig: Heinrichs). Dr. Stumme has published a valuable and interesting book, and we must echo the surprise he expresses in his preface that the work has been hitherto so much neglected by the French masters of Northern Africa. The Arabic dialects of Tripoli, Tunis, and Algeria form a group which may be conveniently termed Moghrebi Arabic; in pronunciation, grammar, and vocabulary it presents many peculiarities, and a knowledge of it is thus indispensable for the comparative study of the Semitic languages. Dr. Stumme has had the help of Prof. Silvers in the phonological portion of his book, so that the phonetist may accept its statements with confidence. The section on the metre of the poems is exhaustive and suggestive, and the poems themselves are given both in Arabic characters and in a Latin transcription. The latter is absolutely necessary in the case of a modern Arabic dialect. A translation of each poem is added, as well as a very complete vocabulary. The student of folk-lore will find much to interest him in the poems, and the printing of the book leaves nothing to be desired.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MISTAKES ABOUT THE ANDAMANS.

Government House, Port Blair.

It seems to be still the fashion among savants and others to treat the Andaman Islands as a terra incognita, in writing about which errors and misdescriptions may be made with impunity, or, at any rate, looked upon with lenient eyes. This attitude towards the Islands is extended to their inhabitants, and this though they have been long—very long—part of the British dominions; though it is more than a hundred years since the first attempt was made to colonise them; though they have been brought under regular government by Commission for nearly forty years. There are men who have grown grey in the local government service. The coasts were charted and mapped over a century ago, with that skill and accuracy which was so distinguishing a feature of the work of the old Indian Navy; and many a large scale chart has been issued in the interval, making the intricacies of the coral reefs which surround the Islands safe for the largest vessels, as I know by personal experience. The Trigonometrical Survey of India has sent its parties from end to end of the Islands, so that the mapping of the interior is as complete as that of the coasts, and no part of the Islands can be said to be actually unknown. The government has been for years carried on in the usual Indian style, and reports have been made for years in the usual detail. The inhabitants have been described and figured over and over again by local writers, with a detail and an accuracy that I think can hardly be surpassed by those who have undertaken to tell the world about savage races. The museums of Europe and England are filled with astonishingly complete drawings and articles, described with minute accuracy, and illustrating the Andamanese and their ways: the British, the Pitt-Rivers at Oxford, the Cambridge, the Imperial-Royal at Vienna, to my personal inspection and knowledge.

One would think, then, that it is not really difficult to get at the facts about the Andamans and the Andamanese; but, nevertheless, one can hardly pick up any book or paper about them, published for the benefit of the public, even by distinguished European writers, without being taken aback at the wildness of the statements made. It is a strong instance of this that has lately come to my notice which has induced me now to write this letter.

In Sir John Lubbock's Prehistoric Times (fifth edition, 1890) there occur (pp. 438-439) a series of typical errors about the Andamanese, all avoidable had he followed Mr. Man's admirable Andaman Islanders, with the existence of which his remarks show him to have been acquainted. It was published originally in the Journal of the Anthropological Institute, of which Institute Sir John was, and, I believe, still is, a member.

I will now take the statements made, categorically, and place scientific fiction and fact side by side, so that your readers may distinguish the real from the unreal for themselves.

Sir John commences:—

(Sir J. Lubbock.)

The Mincopies* or inhabitants of the Andaman Islands, have been described by Dr. Mouat, Sir E. Belcher, Mr. Day, Mr. Man, and Prof. Owen, who considers that they "are, perhaps, the most primitive, or lowest in the scale of civilisation, of the human race." Their huts consist of four posts, the two front ones six to eight feet high, the back ones only one or two feet. They are open at the sides, and covered with a roof of bamboo, or a few palm leaves bound tightly together.

The Mincopies live chiefly on fruit, mangroves, and shell-fish. Sometimes, however, they kill the small pigs which run wild in the jungle.

They have single tree canoes, hollowed out with a P-shaped axe, assisted probably by the action of fire. They are acquainted with the use of outriggers, which, however, appear to have been of recent introduction, as they are not alluded to by the earlier writers.

Their arrows and spears are now generally tipped with iron and glass, which they obtain from wrecks, and which have to a great extent replaced bone. Their harpoons, like those of so many other savages, have a movable head, and a long cord by which this may be held when fixed in the victim. They are very skilful with the bow, and "make practice at forty or fifty yards with unerring certainty," though their arrows have no feathers.

Facts.

* This word is unknown to the tribes of the Great Andaman with whom we are acquainted. It came to us from the writers and settlers at Port Blair, in 1792, and is a word got from the wild and unapproachable tribe now known to us as "the Jarawas," with whom the old settlers seem to have been on friendly terms.

The roofs are never of bamboo or palm, but of cane leaves.

They live chiefly on pig, fish, turtle, roots, and shell-fish; only occasionally on fruit, and then more often (especially in the Little Andaman) on the fruit of one species of mangrove.

They use an adze, not an axe, for hollowing out canoes, and the adze is never P-shaped. They never use fire to assist in the hollowing. The outrigger canoe is the oldest form: the large single canoe being peculiar to the South Andaman group of tribes and of recent introduction.

The arrows are never tipped with glass. They are only fairly skilful with the bow, and make practice with anything but unerring certainty.

They have no pottery, but use either shells or pieces of bamboo to hold water.

They kill fish by harpoons, or with small hand-nets they take any that are left by the tide, and it is even said that they are able to dive and catch them with their hands.

They cover themselves with mud, and also tattoo, but wear no clothes.

They are stated to have no idea of a Supreme Being, no religion, nor any belief in a future state of existence. After death, the corpse is buried in a sitting posture. When it is supposed to be entirely decayed, the skeleton is dug up, and each of the relations appropriates a bone. In the case of a married man, the widow takes the skull, and wears it suspended by a cord round her neck. It forms a very convenient box for small articles.

Marriage, however, only lasts, at least in some tribes, until the child is born and weaned, when, according to Lieut. St. John, as quoted by Sir E. Belcher, the man and woman generally separate, each seeking a new partner.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE court of the Salters Company has made a grant of £150 a year to the City and Guilds of London Institute, to found one or more fellowships for the encouragement of higher research in chemistry in its relation to manufactures. Preference will be given to students who have completed a three years' course at the Central Technical College.

Mrs. W. TOPLEY has presented more than one hundred looks, pamphlets, and maps, from the library of her late husband, to the Geological Society.

IN Darwinism and Race Progress, which Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. will shortly publish, Prof. Huxley shows how the racial deterioration which would result from our modern care of the sickly and enfeebled may be counteracted by a keener public conscience, and finally by public regulations in

They have had pottery from the earliest times, but it is not used for holding water.

They only kill dugongs, turtle, and such fish as sharks, &c., with harpoons. They shoot fish with bow and arrow. They catch small fish left by the tide with their hands or kill them with stones. Only the women use hand-nets, and then only for prawns, &c.; the men would consider it effeminate to use hand-nets.

They are not always covered with mud; the mud-smearing is ceremonial, special muds being used for special occasions. The Ongé group of tribes never tattoo themselves.

They do believe in a Supreme Being. Mr. Man's book goes at great length into this point. The corpse is generally put up in a tree, and is seldom buried. The widow takes the skull sometimes: generally it is the nearest male relative that takes it. The skull is never used as a box.

Marriage lasts for life, and is seldom dissolved, never after the birth of a child. The whole statement is quite incorrect.

regard to the duties of parentage. Our preservation of unworthy types by public and private charity is strongly animadverted upon; and it is suggested that separation of the criminal classes from the incapables and deserving poor will prepare the public mind for ultimate segregation of incorrigible types. In respect to intellectual development, it is pointed out that the present democratic movement, while it gives a chance to the clever and capable of becoming educated and well-to-do, entails upon them conditions which generally imply late marriages and relative sterility. The work is optimistic throughout: and the author believes that the public, when instructed in the laws of race-history, will not hesitate to adopt such measures as will lead to triumphs by the side of which those of preventive medicine are insignificant.

MR. EDMUND SEALE will publish early in the spring a third edition of The Horsebreeders' Handbook, edited by Mr. Joseph Osborne (Beacon).

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE Académie des Inscriptions has chosen the following subject for the Prix Bordin (3000 francs), to be awarded next year: "An examination of the relations between the Ἀθηναίων Πολιτεία and the acknowledged works of Aristotle, both in substance and in style."

THE December number of the Classical Review (David Nutt) opens with an article, by Mr. A. H. T. Greenidge, on "The Power of Pardou possessed by the Princeps," which contains an elaborate examination of criminal jurisdiction under the early empire; Mr. T. D. Seymour, of Yale, propounds the thesis that, according to Aeschylus, the action of the "Eumenides" closes only a few days after that of the "Agamemnon," from which it follows that Orestes must be grown-up at the time of his father's death; Mr. E. S. Thompson maintains the view—supported recently by Prof. H. Sidgwick and Dr. Sandys—that the ἐκτιμήματα paid only a sixth (not five-sixths) of the produce as rent. Among reviews, the most important is that of Monro's "Modes of Ancient Greek Music," by Mr. H. Stuart Jones, who fairly presents the arguments both for and against the novel theory advanced in that book; Mr. E. W. Fay, of Lexington, gives a detailed analysis of Schwab's "Syntax of the Greek Comparative," concluding thus: "(A) ἢ (quam) c. nom. and acc. is a substitute for a casus separationis (gen., abl.), after a comparative; but (B) inflectible phrases require ἢ (quam) at all periods"; and Mr. F. W. Thomas reviews Pick's "Greek Proper Names," suggesting a hope that the author may hereafter add a treatment of place-names. Under archaeology, there is little except the monthly record of discoveries and the summary of periodicals.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

CAMBRIDGE ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY.—(Monday, Nov. 26.)

MR. FAWCETT, president, in the chair.—Prof. Hughes exhibited and described a collection of pottery from a new locality near Great Chesterford, which proved the extension of the Roman rubbish pits a quarter of a mile further to the north than the large gravel pit near the camp, from which most of the remains hitherto recorded had been procured. He had once seen three large amphorae, which were said to have been found on the hill to the north-east of Chesterford; but he had no information as to the circumstances of that find, nor as to any other objects found associated with them. The discovery to which he now drew attention was made somewhat by accident. He had drawn attention to the hole from which the objects were procured, as an example of an artificial excavation filled with made earth as distinguished from some natural pipes in the same gravel pit, and challenged his companions to put his assertion to the test. A short search disclosed the remains of domestic animals and pottery. The specimens were of such interest, both intrinsically and on account of their locality, that he had asked the owners, Messrs. Wale, Joyce, Tod and Berry, to allow him to exhibit them to the society, and record the discovery. Among the objects found was a portion of a vessel in soft red paste, with a strong black lustre glaze, on which was moulded a female figure kneeling. The drawing was so bad, as compared with that on the Samian ware, that one felt inclined to suggest that this must have been the production of an unskilled native artist imitating better work. There were at least six drinking cups with pinched sides, some with ornament in relief, and some with more, some with less lustre. There was also a red-ware vessel in shape like a flower-pot saucer on a stand, and adapted, as were several of those previously found at Great Chesterford, to receive a similar shaped vessel which formed its lid, as nowadays the covers of entrée dishes are sometimes adapted for independent use. There were also some good pieces of Samian ware. One basin had the potter's mark; but this was, unfortunately, illegible, owing to the imperfection of the stamp. Another piece of Samian was a fragment of a very fine mortarium, in which a portion of the roughened interior surface was preserved, while a lion's head, perforated through the mouth, formed the spout. There was also a portion of the rim of one of the ordinary mortaria in rough yellow ware, and two shallow pans in shape like flower-pot saucers. The fragments of black earthenware belong to common forms. He remarked that in this case there was a larger proportion of better class highly ornamented ware than was generally found in the pits along the west side of the camp; and he thought that, whatever the place may originally have been, and whenever the earthworks were first thrown up, all the remains found about Great Chesterford pointed to the existence of a permanent Roman town rather than to a temporary military station, though there may have been, of course, first of all a camp thrown up by the advancing legionaries. He had not as yet found evidence of the occupation of the area by any pre-Roman people. He believed that Roman camps, properly so-called, were rare, but that Roman towns, villages, and villas were common; and that these were sometimes surrounded by a bank and moat, as were the granges of later times. The Romans adopted the rectangular form for their towns, as they did by rule for their camps, where the natural features or pre-existing works did not make some other arrangement more convenient. So also in the case of the moated granges of later times, the square form is most common, but is modified wherever the bend of a watercourse or facility of digging suggested another outline. In reply to a question by the president, he said that he did not attach much importance to the name "Chester," especially when combined with a word derived from another language, as in "Chesterford." He thought the castra of the Romans may have given rise to the caestre of the Saxons, but that they did not confine the name to places where there had been a Roman camp. On a matter of this kind, however, he would refer to Prof. Skeat, who, he was glad to say, was present.—Prof. Skeat said: The Anglo-Saxon ceaster is merely an adaptation of the Latin castrum. But it is misleading to suppose that it always meant "camp." Bosworth's Dictionary correctly gives: Cæster, a city, fort, castle, town." An easy example is in Matt. v. 14, where the A.S. version has ceaster, and the modern English has "a city." The diminutive castellum even means "village" in the Latin version, in the Durham MS.; the A.S. version has castel in the same passage—viz., Matt. xxi. 2.

VIKING CLUB.—(Friday, Dec. 7.)

DR. KARL BLIND in the chair.—Mr. Poultney Bigelow gave a short account of "A Visit to a Lapland Settlement near the Arctic Circle." He pointed out that the Lapps were in a very similar position to the North American Indians, pushed back by a superior race till they were only saved from extinction by the fact that the regions in which they had taken refuge were so desolate that no one else could covet their possession. He had been much struck by their resemblance both in appearance and manners, as well as in stature, to the Japanese; and there was a conceivable chain of communication via the Aleutian Islands and North America, which their progenitors might have made use of. The name Lapp means "banished," and is one given them by their enemies, which they themselves do not recognize, presenting in this respect, as also in meaning, a perfect parallel to the name Esquimaux. The Lapps evince considerable intelligence, their skilful management of their teams of reindeer being particularly noticeable. At the close of his remarks Mr. Bigelow presented to the Club two Lapp spoons and a knife in an ornamented sheath, and called attention to the enormous expenditure of time and labour by uncivilised races on the making of such simple tools as these. He also gave three Norwegian boat models, one being on the lines of the Viking ship discovered at Gokstad, in Norway, in 1880, now in the University of Christiania. Her lines, he pointed out, are those of the best type of boat in all ages, and re-appear to-day in the canoe and the life-boat.—Dr. Jon Stefansson, of Iceland, whose essays on Scandinavian elements in Middle Scotch and on dialects in Wycliffe's Bible were awarded the silver medal and grand gold medal at the University of Copenhagen, then read a paper on "Scandinavian Influence on English Literature." He pointed out how largely their Norse blood had influenced Englishmen, who were in truth, he said, the Vikings of modern times, and had inherited the Norsemen's genius for colonisation and that spirit which gave them the dominion of the sea to a greater degree even than their descendants in purely Scandinavian countries. The earliest English Epic we possess, Beowulf, which was probably composed before the conquest of England, if not of Scandinavian origin, has its scene laid in Scandinavia. In the Icelandic Sagas we have frequent mention of visits of Icelandic skalds to England, such as the account of Egil's dealings with King Athelstan and Gunnlung's visit to the court of King Æthelred. Canute also kept many Norse court poets about him. In the middle period of English literature there are no traces of such influence, yet Shakspeare, by his divine intuition, portrays in his "Macbeth" characters which show distinctly the peculiar features of personages that we meet with in the Icelandic Sagas. We may, for instance, compare Lady Macbeth with Hallgerda in Njal's Saga. In "Hamlet," again, we have a story taken from Northern sources. There the story is extant in two forms—in the Latin version given by Saxo Grammaticus and in the Amloða Saga. Shakspeare's "Hamlet," it should be observed, resembles the latter more closely than it does Saxo's story. Here we must remember that James I. was married to Anne of Denmark, who had many Danes about her and was also a great protectress of the drama. Her brother, Christian, King of Denmark, visited her in England, and in his train were two noblemen named Rosencrantz and Guildenstern. Obviously there is here a possibility of the poet having derived his story directly from Danish sources. After running underground so long, the Scandinavian undercurrent reappears into broad daylight in the middle of the eighteenth century with Thomas Gray and Bishop Percy. The former divined, even through the Latin dress in which he met with it, the fire and force of Northern poetry. His "Fatal Sisters" and "Descent of Odin" show a wonderful insight into its inner spirit, and a keen critical sense which enable him to reject verses now acknowledged to be spurious. The persistent error that the Norseman looked forward to drinking mead in Valhalla out of the skulls of his slain enemies calls for a word of notice. The mistake arose from a mistranslation, by which "bent tree of the head"—namely, drinking-horn, made out of an ox-horn, was rendered skull. Bishop Percy, besides some translations of Icelandic poetry also translated from the French M. Mallet's Northern Antiquities. Sayers of Norwich, who put Norse into the form of the Greek drama; Cottle of Bristol, who translated the Elder Edda; and W. Herbert, Dean of Manchester, a friend of Percy, and a great Icelandic scholar, who praises Gray highly, but lavishes abuse on Cottle for his ignorant work—are others who helped to introduce Englishmen to the wealth of Icelandic literature. The movement was recognised by Southey and Coleridge, and the former wrote a long epistle in verse for Cottle to prefix to his translation of the Edda. Even a classical scholar like Landor divined the power of the Northern Muse, and in a letter to Bulwer, written at the age of ninety, he compared the Icelandic poetry very favourably with that of the troubadours. Sir Walter Scott, in Illustrations to Northern Antiquities, published in 1814 an abstract of the Eyrbyggja Saga. In that same year Waverley appeared; and it is at any rate a curious coincidence that, just before making his first essay as a novelist, he should have formed the acquaintance of the great Icelandic school of story-tellers. He was the first to use in English the word Berserk. The increasing Scandinavian influence reaches its culminating point in Mr. William Morris and his school, the weightiest part of whose work is saturated with the old Icelandic spirit. His first translation from the Icelandic, "The Story of Grettir the Strong," was published exactly twenty-five years ago.

FINE ART.

Life in Ancient Egypt. By A. Erman. Translated by H. M. Tirard. (Macmillans.)

To anyone who knows anything of Egyptology, Prof. Erman's Aegypten, now presented to the English reader under the title of Life in Ancient Egypt, does not need an introduction. Prof. Erman is one of the ablest of living Egyptologists, and his work is an exhaustive account of what the native monuments have to tell us about the manners and customs of the ancient dwellers on the Nile. Unlike the classic work of Sir Gardner Wilkinson on the same subject, its materials are not confined to the wall-decorations of tombs and temples or the questionable statements of Greek and Latin writers; they are drawn also from the inscriptions and papyri, in the decipherment of which the author has taken so prominent a part.

After an account of the country and its people and a sketch of its history, we plunge at once into the main subject of the book. The life of ancient Egypt is brought before us in all its varieties, and in its most minute details. Indeed, the only objection that can be brought against the work is that it is too exhaustive in its German accuracy of detail ever to become what is termed "popular reading." It is too crammed with facts and references to be the companion of an idle hour. But the visitor to Egypt or the student of the ancient East is bound to have it constantly at his side, and its excellent arrangement and index will enable him to discover without difficulty the answers to all the questions he is likely to ask. The different classes of ancient Egyptian society, the police and the army, family life and religion, education, literature, science, and the arts, agriculture and trade—all alike are treated with a marvellous fulness and minuteness of detail.

One of the points upon which Prof. Erman insists with good reason is just that which the student of Egyptian antiquity has been too much inclined to ignore. We are all ready enough to admit the enormous length of time covered by the Egyptian monuments; but practically it is apt to become preshortened in our historical perspective, and we forget that during this long period of time the Egyptian people must have changed very considerably. Not only their manners and customs, but even their language and writing, underwent a large amount of alteration, as well as their dress and their religion. The pyramid texts of the Old Empire, discovered and published by Prof. Maspero, have given us the means of comparing the ideas and beliefs of that early epoch with those of a later age, while other texts have allowed us to do the same for other departments of ancient Egyptian life. Prof. Erman's chapter on dress is especially interesting in this connexion, as it offers a good illustration of the changes and development that went on in almost every branch of social life.

Another point which distinguishes the book is the extensive use made in it of the information furnished by the hieratic papyri, whole passages of which are from time to time translated. The pictorial history of old Egyptian life has thus been supplemented by its literary history, derived from the popular literature of the country, and accordingly full of allusions to the daily life of the people. After reading some of these translations, it will be impossible to deny the existence of a literature, in the truest sense of the word, in ancient Egypt.

The illustrations have been carefully selected, chiefly from the works of Wilkinson, Lepsius, and Perrot; and the English edition of the work is got up in a way which leaves nothing to be desired. Print, paper, and binding are alike excellent. The translation is also good, so far as I have been able to compare it with the German original; but it is a pity that the proper names were not better adapted to the rules of English spelling. Ch in English does not represent a guttural aspirate but a palatal, and consequently words like "Chufu," "Chuen'eten," and "Chotas," will necessarily be mispronounced. Nor is the spelling of modern Egyptian names always correct; witness "Feyum" instead of Fayyûm. A table also should have been added, giving the equivalents of the ancient proper names as written by Prof. Erman in the spelling to which the English reader is accustomed; how is he to know, for example, that 'Ess'e is Assa, or that D'ar is Zar (which, by the way, is written Ziri in the cuneiform tablets of Tel el-Amarna)? But perhaps the worst mistake of all is the use of j, as in German, to represent y; thus Qawyet is written "Zawijet." I ought to add that, as is stated in the Preface, the account of the arts and tools of the Egyptian workmen must be supplemented by the information contained in Prof. Petrie's publications which have appeared since Prof. Erman's work was compiled.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY. WE are glad to hear that the lamented death of Mr. Hamerton will not affect the continuance of the Portfolio in the new form which it assumed just a year ago. Indeed, the subjects of almost all the monographs for next year had been already settled by him, in conjunction with Mr. Richmond Seeley, upon whom devolves for the present the task (which he would in any case have discharged) of producing and illustrating them under the guidance of the writers. The monograph for January, 1895, will be on The Early Work of Raphael, by Julia Cartwright (Mrs. Henry Ady), with four plates after the "Madonna del Granduca," the "Sposalizio," the "Saint Sebastian," and the painter's portrait of himself, and more than twenty minor illustrations. The following have also been arranged for: Holbein, by Sir Frederick Burton; Turner in Switzerland, by Mr. Alfred Hunt; Velazquez, by Mr. Walter Armstrong; Whitehall, by the Rev. W. J. Loftie; William Blake, by Dr. R. Garnett; Watteau, by Mr. Claude Phillips; The Dulwich Gallery, by Mr. Humphry Ward; Japanese Engraving, by Prof. Anderson; and Claude, by Mr. George Graham. With regard to the binding of this year's monographs, it has been decided that the most convenient plan will be to put three together into one volume, making four handy volumes for the year. Four cloth cases have accordingly been prepared, with a title-page for each volume.

THE following exhibitions will open next week: water-colour drawings of the Wey Valley and Charterhouse School, by Mr. Percy Robertson; and one hundred and ten water-colours of Familiar Haunts round Six of the Public Schools—both at the Fine Art Society's in New Bond-street; a second series of drawings by Mr. H. B. Brabazon, at the Goupil Gallery, in Regent-street; and a collection of Scotch paintings—by Messrs. T. Austen Brown, J. Coutts Michie, R. B. Nisbet, and R. Noble—at St. George's Gallery, in Grafton-street.

THE next exhibition at the Dudley Gallery will consist of pictures selected and arranged by Mr. Harry Quilter, under the general title of "The Expressionals." It will open to the public on the last day of the year.

UNDER the auspices of the Sunday Lecture Society, Mr. Wyke Bayliss, president of the Royal Society of British Artists, will deliver a lecture at St. George's Hall, Langham-place, on Sunday next, at 4 p.m., upon "The Use of the Supernatural in Art."

THE collection of Jenner relics, which were described in the ACADEMY on the occasion of their exhibition at Bristol in the autumn of 1893, are to be sold at auction by Messrs. Puttick & Simpson on Friday next. The collection includes portraits in oil, miniatures, and engravings; diplomas, grants of freedom, &c.; visiting-books, letters, and other MSS.; printed books and pamphlets; and also many personal relics. It is not too late to hope that this unique illustrative memorial of the discoverer of vaccination may yet be acquired, if not for the nation, at least by one or other of the two Royal Colleges of the healing art, to both of which Jenner belonged.

M. ALFRED STEVENS's picture of "The Woman in Yellow," exhibited last year at the Champ de Mars Salon, has been purchased at the Garnier sale for 5000 francs by the French Government, and will be placed in the Luxembourg.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

THE Saturday Popular Concert opened with the new version of Brahms' Pianoforte Trio in B major (Op. 8). The work, written more than forty years ago, was only recently revised by the composer. The music is interesting, and so, too, are the alterations; but Brahms would, perhaps, have done better to leave well alone. It is, doubtless, a great temptation to composers to retouch early productions, and one to which Haydn, Schumann, Wagner, and others yielded. The performance of the Trio, by Herr Sauer, Lady Hallé, and Mr. Ould, was exceedingly good. The pianist's solo was Chopin's Sonata in B minor, and of this difficult and unequal work he gave a very fine rendering. We should have liked more warmth of tone, more romantic charm in the slow movement; but, considered as a whole, the performance was, so far as we have heard him, one of Herr Sauer's best. His determination not to accept the encore of course met with our special approval. The programme included six songs, sung by Miss Fillunger, from a collection of German Volkslieder, recently published by Brahms. The fresh, natural melodies are set off to advantage by the clever accompaniments, by an art which "itself is nature."

The Smetana Quartet, mentioned last week, was repeated at the Monday Popular Concert, but the performance was not so good. It was scarcely wise to give the work twice in immediate succession. The music is clever, characteristic, and attractive, but easy to follow. The second impression was not so strong as the first; the novelty of the music proved less piquant, and its weak points more perceptible. Mr. Isidor Cohn performed Schubert's "Wanderer" Fantasia with skill and intelligence, but not with sufficient power and poetry. Miss Dale, the vocalist, sang with taste.

Herr Sauer gave his sixth recital on Monday afternoon. He played Beethoven's Sonata in G (Op. 31, No. 1), the least interesting of the three included under that opus number. The opening Allegro was rendered in rather a flippant style, and the middle section of the Adagio required more movement; though, on the whole, there was some excellent playing. The Schubert-Tausig "Andantino und Variationen" were interpreted with great delicacy. The theme is undoubtedly Schubert's; but, if we are not mistaken, Tausig's share in the variations was the larger of the two.

Haydn's "Creation" was performed by the Queen's Hall Choral Society on Tuesday evening. The music of the old master is refreshing, particularly to those who are constantly hearing modern works. The development of music has not been all progress. There are moments of immense power in the "Creation." Much of Haydn's music is weak, not because it is old, but because his lot had been cast in too pleasant places for him to develop his powers to the full, and this he knew himself. For years he wrote to please princes; he worked according to order, not inspiration. Haydn's genius saved him from mediocrity; for, with exception of Mozart, he was the greatest composer of his day. Had he but served his art as faithfully as he did his princes, he would have secured for his works greater and more lasting fame. The performance of the Oratorio, under the careful direction of Mr. Carter, who seemed thoroughly to enjoy the music, was commendable. The vocalists were Miss Anna Williams and Messrs. Iver McKay and Norman Salmond. The last named was not in good voice.

Mr. Richard Gompertz gave his second concert of chamber music at the Salle Erard on Wednesday evening. The programme commenced with the Smetana Quartet in E minor, announced with the superscription "Aus meinem Leben." We presume there is authority for this, and wonder why it was omitted in the "Popular" book. It is a frank acknowledgment on the part of the composer that he is writing programme music, and explains, to some extent, the peculiarities of the Quartet. The performance by Messrs. Gompertz, Inwards, Kreuz, and Ould was good; they seemed thoroughly to enter into the Bohemian spirit of the music.

The rendering of Beethoven's great Quartet in A minor (Op. 132) also demands praise: it was not only careful, but thoroughly sympathetic. Mr. Gompertz has for several seasons made a feature of Beethoven's late Quartets, and his perseverance will in time meet with reward. Not the first part of the Ninth Symphony, but the five last Quartets, were Beethoven's last words in instrumental music. Mr. Gompertz played a new and effectively written Barcarole by Mr. E. Moor. Miss Fillunger sang some delightful songs by Schubert and Schumann.

WARD & DOWNEY (Ld.) York Buildings, Adelphi, W.C.

On and after January 1, 1895, the published price of the ANTIQUARY will be reduced from One Shilling to SIXPENCE. The shape of the magazine, however, will be uniform with the old series.

THE ANTIQUARY,

AN ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE DEVOTED TO THE STUDY OF THE PAST.
For 1895.

With the number for January, 1895, the ANTIQUARY will enter on the Sixteenth year of its age, and begin the Thirty-first Volume. Several improvements will be introduced. Better and smoother paper will be used, in order to give clearer impressions of illustrations. The latter will be increased in number in proportion to the letterpress, so as to give the ANTIQUARY a more distinct position as a high-class illustrated Journal of Antiquities. At the same time the price will be reduced to one-half of what it has been, and the ANTIQUARY will, for the future, be issued at SIXPENCE A NUMBER. The managers of the magazine trust that these changes will prove to be generally acceptable.

The ANTIQUARY will also endeavour not only to retain the position it has earned as the leading English Archaeological Magazine of the day, but, if possible, to become of even more service to the study of Archaeology in the future, as time goes on.

A detailed Prospectus will be sent post free, but the arrangements for 1895 may be briefly summarized as follows:—

ROMAN ANTIQUITIES by Mr. F. HAVERFIELD, M.A., F.S.A., Mr. W. H. ST. JOHN HOPE, M.A., Mr. JOHN WARD, F.S.A., and Mr. G. E. FOX, M.A., F.S.A.

FOLK-LORE by Mr. A. W. MOORE, M.A., Miss MABEL PEACOCK, Mr. J. LEWIS AUDRÉ, F.S.A., and Mr. R. C. HOPE, F.S.A.

ECCLESIASTICAL ARCHÆOLOGY by the Rev. W. J. LOFTIE, B.A., F.S.A., Mr. EDWARD PEACOCK, F.S.A., Rev. E. MAULE COLE, M.A., Rev. W. G. D. FLETCHER, M.A., F.S.A., Mr. ARTHUR G. LANGDON, Rev. F. W. WEAVER, and Mr. F. G. KITTON.

OLD ENGLISH ARTS, CRAFTS, and TRADES by Mr. E. WYNHAM HULME, Rev. J. T. FOWLER, D.C.L., F.S.A., Mr. C. WALCH, F.S.A., Miss E. E. THOYTS, Mr. T. M. FALLOW, M.A., F.S.A., and Mr. WILFRID CRIPPS, C.B., F.S.A.

DOCUMENTARY MATTER by Mr. W. PAGE, F.S.A., Mr. N. HONE, and the Rev. F. W. WEAVER, M.A.

Mr. W. H. ST. JOHN HOPE, M.A., will write on the BETTER ORGANIZATION of ARCHÆOLOGICAL MEETINGS. It is also intended to give a brief account of the LONDON and PROVINCIAL ARCHÆOLOGICAL SOCIETIES, according to counties, with an epitome of their publications.

The series of papers on PROVINCIAL MUSEUMS will be continued.

The following Antiquaries have also kindly expressed their intention of assisting during the course of the year:—

The Right Hon. Viscount DILLON, F.S.A.
The Worshipful R. S. FERGUSON, M.A., LL.M., F.S.A.

THROAT AND COUGH

Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use

EPPS'S GLYCERINE JUJUBES.

In contact with the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, the glycerine in these agreeable confections becomes actively healing.

Sold only in boxes, 7½d., and tins, 1s. 1½d. Labelled:

MILTON DICTATING "PARADISE LOST."

"Charmingly illustrated by eighteen reproductions of Romney's works, in which the grace and style with which he could paint women and children are abundantly manifested."—Scotsman. "The book is welcome, and all the more so because it furnishes reproductions (excellently effected) of seventeen of the most characteristic of his paintings."—National Observer.

SECOND EDITION, with 5 Maps and 3 Etched Plates, 7s. 6d.

- (2) DIARY of a CAVALRY OFFICER in the PENINSULAR and WATERLOO CAMPAIGNS. By the late Lieut.-Colonel TOMKINSON. "A delightful work. It is a thousand pities it was not published long ago, for it is one of the works that go to the making of history."—Daily Chronicle.

- (3) WOODSIDE, BURNSIDE, HILLSIDE, and MARSH. By J. W. TUTT, F.E.S. Fully Illustrated. Cloth, 2s. 6d. "Mr. Tutt is an excellent observer of nature."—Saturday Review. "Exactly what is required to enable birds, moths, and flowers to be identified and, still better, to be understood. It is a pleasure to commend it."—Academy.

CONCORDANCE to the POETICAL WORKS of MILTON. By JOHN BRADSHAW, M.A., LL.D. Royal 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. "In accuracy and thoroughness it is not, as far as we can find, to be rivalled, much less surpassed."—Pall Mall Gazette.

NATURAL RIGHTS. By D. G. RITCHIE, M.A., Professor of Logic and Metaphysics in the University of St. Andrews. 10s. 6d. Principles of 1789—Idea of "Nature" in Law and Politics—What Determines "Rights"?—Liberty of Thought—Toleration—Public Meeting—Association—Contract—Equality—Property—Right of Hospitality, &c. [Library of Philosophy.]

PRIMITIVE CIVILISATIONS. By E. J. SIMCOX. 2 vols., large 8vo, 32s. "A contribution to economical and social history of exceptional value and importance."—Times.

SOCIOLOGY AND ECONOMICS.

"The Real Lot of the Wage Earner."

THREE MONTHS in a WORKSHOP.

By PAUL GOHRE. Edited by Prof. R. T. ELY, Ph.D., LL.D. 2s. 6d. The experiences and observations of a student in a large German factory. Full of economical, social, and moral interest. Has led to the formation of the Evangelical Social Congress.

WORKERS on their INDUSTRIES.

A Series of Articles on the Origin, Development, Position, and Prospects of Leading Industries, by Expert Workmen. Edited by F. W. GALTTON. 2s. 6d.

SOCIALISM: its Nature, Strength, and Weakness. By Professor R. T. ELY, Ph.D., LL.D. 6s. "Very useful, interesting, and lucid. A more fair-minded book we never read."—Daily Chronicle.

POPULATION and the SOCIAL

SYSTEM. By Dr. F. S. NITTI. 2s. 6d. (Social Science Series.) "A compact epitome of the various theories of the last one hundred years."—Saturday Review.

GERMAN SOCIETY at the CLOSE of the MIDDLE AGES. By E. BELFORT BAX. 5s. "The work is a good and interesting one, and we heartily commend it."—Daily Chronicle.

SOBER by ACT of PARLIAMENT.

By F. A. MCKENZIE. 3s. 6d. "As a summary of drink legislation and temperance experiment it is invaluable, being throughout impartial to the verge of unnecessary candour."—Pall Mall Gazette.

SCIENCE and ETHICS: a Social

System. By W. A. MACDONALD. 2s. 6d.

MORAVIAN and SILESIAN MINERS.

By Dr. BENNO KARPELES. 4to, 7s. 6d.

RECORDS of the HOLE CRAFT and FELLOWSHIP of MASONS. With a History of the Company. By EDW. CONDER, Jun., Master. Facsimiles. 4to, 21s. net. "Authentic materials."—Times. "An extremely handsome quarto—full of curious information. The engravings are singularly fine."—Standard.

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

LECTURES on HUMAN and ANIMAL

PSYCHOLOGY. By Prof. W. WUNDT. 8vo, 15s. The first of the Author's writings which has been made accessible to the English-reading public. Its comparatively popular and introductory character will, it is hoped, render it especially acceptable to the general public for whom the technicalities of the Grundzüge would present difficulties, and to workers in other departments of science.

INTRODUCTION to the STUDY of PHYSIOLOGICAL PSYCHOLOGY. By Dr. ZIEHEN. Second Edition, Revised and Increased. Cuts, 6s. "Exceedingly well adapted to give the student a clear idea of the scope and the methods of the new science."—Nature. "Of special value for the Honours candidates for the London M.D."—Educational Times.

LOGIC. By Prof. C. Sigwart. Translated by H. C. DENDY. 2 vols., 21s. [Library of Philosophy.]

the Philosophy of Evolution. By F. C. S. SCHILLER, M.A. Oxon., Instructor in Logic and Metaphysics in the Cornell University. Second Edition. 8vo, 10s. 6d. "A complete system of philosophy in outline. Highly interesting, and will repay careful study. We hope the student will not neglect such an earnest and careful study of metaphysical problems."—Philosophical Review.

REFORMED LOGIC. A System Based on Berkeley's Philosophy, with an entirely New Method of Dialectics. By D. B. MACLACHLAN. 5s. "The strictly logical chapters are written with great clearness and undoubted ability. Many a good point is made, especially in the criticism of the syllogism."—Educational Times.

PHILOSOPHY AT HOME SERIES.

Neat crown 8vo volumes, 2s. 6d. each.

Lotze, Prof. H.—Outlines of the Philosophy of RELIGION. Translated by F. C. CONYBEARE, M.A. (Oxon.). "One of the most suggestive and enlightening works that our age has been privileged to welcome."—Academy.

Salter, W. M.—First Steps in Philosophy. "Has deservedly reached a second edition."—Literary World.

Bosanquet, Dr. Bernard.—Knowledge and REALITY.

Molinari, G. de.—Religion. Translated by W. K. ERMINGER, B.A. (Oxon.). "Cannot fail of readers here where the question of the relation of Church and State is analogous."—Times.

Bax, E. B.—The Problem of Reality. "An acute and comprehensive little treatise. It is seldom that a complete theory of the Universe is presented in such brief form."—Glasgow Herald. "Nothing in it which a thoughtful reader should find any difficulty in grasping."—Daily Chronicle.

Lillie, A.—Influence of Buddhism on Primitive CHRISTIANITY. "Not content with pointing out the well-known coincidences between Buddhism and Christianity, but seeks to account for them. The learning is imposing and ingenious."—Times.

Schopenhauer, A.—Minor Writings. Translated by BAILEY SANDERS. 2 vols. "Mr. Sanders has done English readers a genuine service."—Athenaeum.

PHILOLOGY AND EDUCATION.

COMPARATIVE GRAMMAR of GERMAN and ENGLISH. By Prof. VICTOR HENRY. Uniform with his "Comparative Grammar of Greek and Latin." Second Edition. Each 7s. 6d. "An excellent introduction to the Comparative Philology of the Indo-European Languages."—Academy.

PROGRESS in LANGUAGE, with SPECIAL REFERENCE to ENGLISH. By Professor OTTO JESPERSEN. (Written in English.) 7s. 6d. "A brilliant and suggestive essay on the contemporary evolution of English grammar."—Times. "A brilliant performance."—Academy.

SCHOOL EDITION OF SEYFFERT.

CLASSICAL ANTIQUITIES, DICTIONARY of. Edited by the late Professor H. NETTLESHIP and Dr. J. E. SANDYS. School Edition, Revised, with all the Illustrations. 10s. 6d.; Presentation Edition, 21s. "At once more concise and more comprehensive than the well-known 'Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities' which has so long held the field in this country, and is now reappearing in a new and enlarged edition. For that very reason it will be more adapted to the requirements of certain classes of students, while its scholarly execution and its copious illustrations render it, within its limits, a formidable rival to Dr. W. Smith's volumes."—Times.

PARALLEL GRAMMAR SERIES.—New Volume.

GREEK SYNTAX. By Professor E. A. SONNENSCHN, M.A. Oxon. 2s. 6d.; or, with the "Accidence," in 1 vol., 4s. 6d. "An admirable working class-book."—Scotsman. "Excellent clear and concise."—Educational Review. "The best practical grammar."—Literary World.

FIRST GREEK READER and WRITER. By J. E. SANDYS, Litt.D., Public Orator in the University of Cambridge. [In preparation. To accompany Professor Sonnenschnein's Grammar.]

STUDENTS' ANGLO-SAXON DIC-

TIONARY. By J. R. CLARK HALL, M.A., Ph.D. 4to (treble columns), 15s. "On every page there appear to be clear indications that the author has been well trained in the principles of his subject, and that the work rests on a firm foundation of sound scholarship."—Journal of Education.

AN ANGLO-SAXON READER. With

Notes and Glossary. By Professor J. W. BRIGHT. 6s. 6d. "The best Anglo-Saxon reader with which we are acquainted."—Educational Review.

SONNENSCHN'S SCHOOL AUTHORS' SERIES.

Reinick's Short Stories. Edited by J. COLVILLE, M.A., D.Sc. Illustrated. 2s.

Riebl's Die Vierzehn Nothelfer. Edited by R. S. MACNAGHTEN, M.A. 1s. 6d.

German Chronicles of War. Edited by Prof. FRANZ LANGE, Ph.D. Maps. 3s. 6d.

Cicero's Pro Milone. Edited by Rev. W. YORKE FAUSSET, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Pro Lege Manilla. Edited by Rev. J. HUNTER SMITH, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Ad Atticum, Bk. IV. Edited by J. BROWN, B.A.

Storm's Immensee. Edited by Dr. JOHN ROBERTSON. [Shortly.]

THREE NEW ONE-VOLUME NOVELS.

- (1) THE WAGES of SIN. By LUCAS MALET. Cheap Edition. 3s. 6d.
- (2) THE FRENCH PRISONER: a Story of Dartmoor and the Western Seas. By THOMAS PINKERTON. 6s. "Mr. Pinkerton's new romances call for very high praise. It is one of the brightest, compactest, and least pretentious that have appeared for a long time. There is certainly no good reason why Mr. Pinkerton should not take a leading place among present-day purveyors of historical fiction."—Academy.
- (3) THE MEMBER for WORKSHIRE; or, Church and State. A Novel. By THOMAS ASPDEN. 6s.

NEW POETRY.

VENICE DEPICTED BY PEN AND PENCIL

Adapted by Mrs. ARTHUR BELL

(N. D'ANVERS).

From the German of HENRY PERL.

With an Introduction by Mr. H. D. TRAILL, D.C.L.
With 180 Full-page and Text Illustrations from Original Drawings by Ettore Tito and other celebrated Venetian Artists.

In one handsome 4to vol., cloth extra, 28s.

A Limited Number of Copies, in a superior binding, at 32s.

Speaking of Venice the Daily News recently said:

"There could be no more fascinating subject, especially for Englishmen. Venice in her day was the greatest of the maritime powers. She came to her decline by the mistake of forsaking the sea for the land. But the interest of Venice is for the whole world. The commerce and the naval supremacy were but two things. Beside them was the glorious effulgence of Venetian art, and the opulence which in itself has a curious charm for the mind. Venice in her great day stood for the pride of life. We like to think of absolutes in all things—in power, in majesty, in splendour, in riches, in art, and in all that gives the fulness of being. Venice lasted long, for more than a thousand years from the dawn of the Ducal power, the Councils, and the great system of administration, to her downfall in the time of the French Republic, when the soldiers of the Revolution occupied the square of Saint Mark, and watched what seemed to be the suppliant doves at their feet..."

LITERATURE.

Life and Letters of Maria Edgeworth. Edited by A. J. C. Hare. In 2 vols. (Edward Arnold.)

MISS EDGEWORTH refused to write an autobiography. Perhaps she was wrong. Had she out of delicacy refrained from excess of family details, enough remained in her life to have made up an ample volume. No doubt her Memoirs of her father, with whom she was so closely identified, may be said to cover the first fifty years of her life; but there she does her best to thrust herself into the background. She was indeed too modest for genuine autobiography. But we should have prized her account of her own literary apprenticeship and experiences; her matured impressions of the many personages whom she knew so intimately; and, above all, her remarks on the Irish events and Irish social conditions of which she was an eye-witness. For such a work these domestic letters are a poor substitute. Indeed, it must be owned that as a whole they are disappointing, and have needed an effort to peruse to the end. They are reprinted from the collection issued privately by Miss Edgeworth's stepmother, and Mr. Hare has—what he calls—"edited" them. How much that means we cannot tell. In his brief preface he says he has merely "made a selection." The publisher's Advertisement speaks of his "omitting any letters and other material of a personal nature which have ceased to be of interest." As a fact, the greater part of what has been retained comes under that description. On what principle then was the selection made? Again, Mr. Hare says that he has "written such a thread of biography as might unite the links of the chain." This refers to the passages in large print which are sandwiched in here and there, often to small purpose. But the Advertisement says that the Letters "formed the greater part of the Memoirs compiled by Mrs. Edgeworth." Clearly then that work contained either a biography, or was a biography enriched with letters. Is then the present large print to be referred to Mrs. Edgeworth or to Mr. Hare or to both, and in what proportions?

This at least is clear, that either Mr. Hare is incompetent for the task he has undertaken, or else that he has spent no pains over it. A more deplorable case of book-making is rarely found, whoever is to blame. Now that the public have once seen the many precious things embedded in the book, clearly the "Letters" will have to be edited over again; but this first attempt may defer a second for several years.

This Life and Letters of Maria Edgeworth contains no Life of her at all. The book might have been made intelligible, if the editor had asked permission to reprint or condense Mr. Leslie Stephen's article in the Dictionary of National Biography. Whether he has referred to it, is not evident; possibly he has not even studied the Memoirs of Mr. Edgeworth. His first dozen pages in large print briefly touch on the origins of the Edgeworth family, and Mr. Edgeworth's numerous marriages. Of Maria we read very little beyond a few scattered letters, till on p. 41 we find her in her thirtieth year. So of her childhood, of her training under her father, and of her earlier work we gather scarce anything. Later on the scraps of large print between the letters become rare. Often they are trivial, often they should have been printed as footnotes; now and then they are really biographical. But in no way do they afford such a "thread of biography as may unite the links of the chain." Long gaps appear unexplained; important incidents in Maria's life are ignored; the clue to innumerable obscurities and inconsistencies is not supplied. Take one instance. Mr. Edgeworth had four wives and twenty-two children. The first wife, Maria's mother, was of good family, one of the four daughters of the heiress of Black Bourton in Oxfordshire, who had married a German gentleman. Till the age of six Maria was brought up by her mother's family. Her father then married again, and we hear no more of the family. Surely we have a right to some explanation of the strange fact that in Maria's almost boundless family affections no place remained for the relations of her ill-used mother. In fact, she never once alludes to her or them at all. If this was due to her father's influence, it is strange that after his death she did not seek reconciliation. Again, these twenty-two children are naturally confusing, especially as three names were duplicated—there were two Honoras, Sophias, and Williams. Maria's letters, being nearly all domestic, swarm with these brothers and sisters, and the large print only yields us fitful and imperfect clues. Suddenly, on p. 243, we find a list of them; but it is a defective one. Dates, sometimes of birth, or marriage, or death, are capriciously added; many of the omissions Mr. Hare could have supplied easily from the text of the book. Moreover, the order of names seems open to doubt.

The Letters, as they stand, are unsatisfactory. They have been pruned either too much or too little. Quite half is purely trivial, written down to the level of the authoress's female correspondents—mere pleasant feminine gossip and outpourings of affection. It has no bearing on her literary character, and most peremptorily would she have forbidden its publication. No doubt this trivial element could have been excised with proper skill, and no doubt will be in the future. On the other hand, if the present work is meant to present Miss Edgeworth, not as an authoress, but as a specimen Irish gentlewoman of her period, it is equally a failure. For then too much has been cut out. What remains is frequently unintelligible. The letters abound with references and allusions which want explanation, though here and there we get glimpses of the beautiful family life led at Edgeworthstown. Probably the suppressed passages would throw light on these obscurities; Mrs. Edgeworth's notes in the private edition, coupled with family archives and traditions, would supply more. By the by, what search has yet been made for further letters not included in that collection? Some must exist. From these various sources a biographer of judgment and good taste might surely paint a series of charming interiors of a house not less interesting than that of the Bruntys. As it is, among the numerous brothers and sisters who flit capriciously through Maria's letters, there is not one who is a personality, not one whom we can grasp or recognise again, save, perhaps, the invalid Lucy, and even she suddenly reappears convalescent at the hymeneal altar. In short, we can only regret that we have been tantalised by these confused, disjointed, fragmentary glimpses of a domestic circle so patriarchal and so interesting. The roomy old mansion of Edgeworthstown—and big it must have been to hold them all with their numerous guests—appears somehow in the photographic frontispiece as a ten-roomed, three-chimneyed £50 villa. All is disillusion.

Mr. Hare's footnotes call for a separate protest. Some few are useful, and probably borrowed from obvious sources. Others are thrown in at hazard now and then, just to remind us that there is an editor who is editing. While real obscurities are ignored, here and there some trivial point is selected for elucidation. Constantly we are puzzled by the first appearance of some relative, under perhaps a Christian name. Gradually after many reappearances we get to understand who it is; and then long after, perhaps in the next volume, when the personage is familiar to us and married off or dead, we get a footnote stating who it is; and what is more, that footnote is then often repeated. Among the many personages met at Paris in 1802, Mr. Hare has picked out at random a few, and extracted for each a couple of lines or so from the dictionary, or oddly enough purloined from the text for his footnote. Thus, Miss Edgeworth mentions M. Suard; whereupon Mr. Hare inserts this note, "M. Suard was editor of the Publiciste." Having digested this information, and wondering why Mr. Hare should drag it in at all, the reader returns to Miss Edgeworth to find, three lines further on, these words, "At present he is at the head of La Publiciste."

It is possible that Mr. Hare has done as much or more than he undertook, and that the Letters were not thought worth serious editing. If so, we can only deplore such an economy of enterprise, and wait patiently till some first-rate hand shall take up a subject which has long claimed attention. A sound, thoughtful, definitive biography of Maria Edgeworth, the inspirer of the Waverley Novels, the "second woman of her time in Europe," would be a great book. It would probably revise the popular estimate of her work; it would account for her limitations, her singular excellencies, and her still more excellent unfulfilled possibilities; it would decide how far she was inspired and fortified, and how far her originality was dwarfed, by the influence of her wonderful father; it would point out how far her central position in that wonderful family made for or against the full development of her genius; it would tell us, not merely what she thought of her contemporaries, but what they thought of her. And since the veil of privacy which she assumed has now been lifted, it cannot be replaced; each Englishman, still more each Englishwoman, may claim that her domestic story should no longer be the heirloom of the family she illustrated; the biographer, therefore, will add to the many high and wholesome lessons which her books have taught one beyond all supreme—that of her life.

What Maria Edgeworth was, how good, how noble, how brilliant, how wise, shall not here be written in review of a presentation of her work so unworthy. Mr. Hare's edition will try the patience of the general reader, but those who care at all for the authoress would do ill to neglect it. For the Letters contain some of the shrewdest, deepest, and most sympathetic things that Miss Edgeworth ever penned. How incisively she inscribes in a few lines the form, features, and character of the personages she met! How gloriously she revels and frolics in her tour—alas! too short—in Connemara! How sweetly and truly she touches every note in the gamut of domestic joys and griefs! If only a judicious friend would mark the best passages for us, the book would be an unalloyed treasure.

One singularity, which might escape notice, may here be added. It is the number of early friends of the Edgeworths who afterwards attained celebrity—Sir Humphrey Davy and the Duchess of Wellington are instances. Maria's last interview with her Grace, "dear Kitty Pakenham," and her encounter with the de Genlis are two superb bits of description: the one pathetic, the other humorous. But if one must quote at all, let it be this inimitable definition of good conversation—

"both Joanna [Baillie] and her sister have most agreeable and new conversation—not old, trumpy literature over again, and reviews, but new circumstances worth telling, à propos to every subject that is touched upon—frank observation of character, without either ill-nature or the fear of committing themselves: no blue-stocking tittle-tattle, or habits of worshipping or being worshipped: domestic, affectionate, good to live with, and without continual fussing, doing what is most obliging and whatever makes us feel most at home."

Reports of State Trials. New Series. Vol. V. Edited by J. E. P. Wallis. (Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

THE fifth volume of the new series of State Trials is wholly given up to one single proceeding—the trial of O'Connell. It is true that this monster prosecution involved many separate steps in addition to the actual trial, and that many other traversers stood at O'Connell's side; but they were all his henchmen and undistinguished, except Charles Gavan Duffy, and the whole interest of the thing centred round

O'Connell's trial and O'Connell's appeal to the House of Lords. It was a long and tangled business. No legal stone was left unturned to prevent the trial from taking place in the first instance, and to render it abortive in the second. The indictment, being a document over eighty feet long, naturally gave rise to motions of similar length. It was prolix: they were dilatory. The traversers delivered pleas in abatement: the Attorney-General demurred to their pleas; and ultimately there was pronounced thereon judgment of respondet oster—to laymen truly a fearsome thing. It took a second demurrer and a second judgment to the like effect to bring the case to trial. The jury were sworn on January 16, 1844; but it was not till February 12 that they gave their verdict, and not till May 30 that judgment was pronounced. O'Connell then went to gaol—a gaol of his own selection—to which he was escorted by the High Sheriff, where, most days in the week, he was at home to callers (to gentlemen on sending in their cards, and to ladies without let or hindrance) and where he was accommodated with a gymnasium, of which he probably made no use, and a pavilion for dinners à fresco, which he probably used a great deal. Eventually his appeal reached the House of Lords; and by the votes of Lords Denman, Campbell, and Cottenham against those of the Chancellor Lyndhurst and the ex-Chancellor Brougham, the appeal was allowed. O'Connell was released from the commodious Richmond Bridewell and walked home to bed; but nothing so tame as mere liberty and a quiet life would do. Next day he returned to the place of his incarceration, in order that he might be publicly enlarged. He was dragged through the streets, standing on the dizzy eminence of a three-storied chariot, gaudy with purple and gold, drawn by six horses, and escorted by an ancient Irish harper, the Lord Mayor in full panoply, his own Head Pacificator, Tom Steele, armed with a branch of peace, and all the trades of Dublin and most of its rascality. It must have been a glorious moment.

The victory, however, if victory there was any, rested not with the agitator and the people, but with the Government and the House of Lords. O'Connell had at any rate served part of his sentence in gaol, and the spell of his long immunity from legal penalties was broken. Age was creeping over him; younger men with strange ideas were making themselves heard; and the Irish people no longer felt as before the compulsion of his persuasive personality. Nor was he himself much disposed to incur a second sentence or to risk a second collision with the law. Though his offences, if they were offences at all, merited far severer pains than the short term of imprisonment to which he was actually sentenced, and though of that term he served but a fraction, the imprisonment practically took all the force out of his agitation. It continued indeed, but it was no longer a menace to English ascendancy. Substantially the Government had the best of it.

The House of Lords, too, came well out of the struggle. It had been denounced as the stronghold of political bigotry and oppression; and, lo! it showed itself before all the world upholding the technicality of the law at the cost of its own political preferences. Most of its members hated O'Connell as a demagogue with what bitterness their disdain of him as Irishman and agitator would permit. Even with the Whig peers he was no favourite, and the great majority of the Lords undoubtedly thought it a mighty salutary thing that he should be laid by the heels in gaol. The current of legal authority ran the same way. To say nothing of the all but unanimous voice of the Irish bench, almost all the English judges whose opinions were taken agreed that the appeal ought to fail on all points. The two who expressed opinions to the contrary differed from their brethren only in one point out of many; and although the great weight of Parke's authority was on one point in favour of the appellant, the majority who took the other view included Tindal, Patteson, Maule, Williams, and Alderson. The peers saw a victory for O'Connell coming nevertheless, coming by a bare majority of one, and that one either Denman or Campbell or Cottenham. Not unnaturally there were some who reflected that they too were peers—not lawyers, indeed, but statesmen—and that they had votes which might put right what Whig law lords were proposing to do wrong. Lyndhurst smarted under his own impending defeat; his anger and disgust are to be read in every word of the sneers that he launched at Parke, who had couched an opinion differing from that of so many of his brethren in terms of decent diffidence. Yet when, among the voices given against allowing the appeal, the "not content" of several lay peers was heard, he would not act upon it. He made no declaration of what he considered to be the sense of the House, but, pausing, put the question again. Then Lord Wharncliffe appealed to the peers not to judge issues which they had not heard, or to decide points of law which they could not understand.

"It is far better," said he, "that the character of this house as a court of appeal and a court of law should be maintained, even though the decision should, in the opinion of your Lordships, be objectionable, as being contrary to that of the judges, and although it should prove inconvenient in this particular instance: it is, I say, under such circumstances better to concur in the opinion of the majority of the law lords, than reverse the judgment of those persons who, by their education and station, must be best able to decide upon subjects of this nature, and who in reality constitute the court of law in this House."

This grave appeal, supported by Lords Brougham and Campbell, was listened to. The lay lords walked out of the House. O'Connell, indeed, was set at liberty; but the dignity of the peers was saved, and the most signal proof possible was given of the impartiality of English law.

As for that law, it certainly did not profit very greatly by all this litigation. O'Connell's case has often been supposed to have declared the iniquity of jury-packing. It really only decided against a practice unconnected with the constitution of juries, which had been followed without question or change for two generations. The House of Lords laid down that separate verdicts and judgment accordingly ought to be entered on the separate counts, and that one general verdict on all counts, with a general judgment "for his offences aforesaid," was bad, if any one of those counts was bad. This victory may add a new terror to the drawing of indictments and shake the nerves of nervous judges; but it can hardly be regarded as the prop of liberty or a corner-stone of the constitution. The point itself is understood to have been suggested by Peacock; judge after judge declared that he heard it at first with astonishment, for all agreed that the uniform opinion of the profession and the practice of the courts had been the other way; but it commended itself to Coltman and to Parke, and that circumstance may perhaps save the ordinary legal mind from having to confess itself constrained, but not convinced, by the decision of the House of Lords in its favour.

The other point is one almost of sentiment. Lord Denman rested his opinion in part upon the irregularity which had occurred in the preparation of the jury list, and bestowed upon it several very eloquent and purple passages. No one else, however, treated this as a ground for allowing the appeal; and, as no one had ever contended that such irregularity was a thing to be encouraged, this part of his speech to the House remains a little in the air. On examination of the list from which the Sheriff summoned the jurymen for O'Connell's trial, it was found that the names of a considerable number of persons qualified to be jurors had somehow been omitted. How and when or by whose fault this occurred was never very clearly made out. Probably it was a mere accidental oversight, a sheet of names—some sixty among over seven hundred—having been overlooked: at any rate, there can be no doubt that the trick, if it was a trick, was committed by irresponsible subordinates, and that no responsible official had anything to do with it. There is no shadow of ground for suggesting that it was a Government stratagem, and on the whole it is unlikely that the addition of those names to the entire list would have had the slightest influence on the result of the trial. But the omission was a godsend to the defenders: they made a grievance of it, and an excellent grievance it was. They challenged the array: that was enough to give the whole proceedings a savour of injustice from the first. It set those who were already of their own way of thinking open-mouthed against the trial, and it gave the other side ground for some uncomfortable misgiving. The court refused the challenge—whether rightly or wrongly was not ultimately decided, but apparently it must be taken rightly; none the less the original stigma hangs about the trial still, and probably neither explanation of the facts nor arguments about the law will ever quite clear it away. Such is the position in which law and history leave what is after all the most striking point in O'Connell's case: and now that they have been recorded in this semi-official series of reports, the other points may be considered to have received decent and final sepulture.

J. A. HAMILTON.

Select Specimens of the Great French Writers.
By Eugène Fasnacht. (Macmillans.)

IN the polity of books the anthology holds a precarious rank. Fit, non nascitur. It is not born to its station; its accomplishments are studied; and it shines, if it shine at all, with a borrowed light. Lacking a birthright, its pretensions will be challenged; and it must be prepared to conquer the prejudice of critics. For a critic may be pardoned, if he avow at once that he prefers to choose one author at a time, and spend profitable hours in his company. 'Tis barely courteous to a poet or a sage to grant him audience for ten minutes, while another of the immortals awaits his turn. So, were we bent on music, we would beg to hear one opera as the composer wrote it, without abridgment or interpolation, rather than sit at a gala performance, where the overture, the several acts, and the ballet were the works of as many masters. When Bayreuth itself could hardly satisfy our appetite for music-dramas, we might pardonably grumble at such scraps as we could get at a Grand Wagner Concert, with heavy layers of analytical programme between the slices. Yet the manner of presentation has its merits. The slight annoyance is the little touch of the spur, which puts the critic on his mettle. "Why," it makes him ask, "do you choose this morsel rather than that? What harmony in the periods, what rhythm in the Alexandrine couplets, is it meant to reveal to the attentive ear?" The concentration of the mind on a single passage is a wholesome discipline. A few pages diligently studied may unlock more of an author's heart than a volume carelessly read.

After this preface on anthologies, be it said that the present volume is a pattern to its class. It contains selections from the best authors of France, in prose and verse, from the foundation of the Academy in 1635 to the year 1893, the most recent authors represented in it being Renan and Taine. Hugo is the last of the poets, since Leconte de Lisle died too lately to take his place among them. But this is not all. Nothing, save a jest-book, is more insipid than mere elegant extracts, or duller than a mere history of literature with no extracts and no elegance. The latter kind of compilation flourishes in Germany. The true home of the former, we fear, is England. A Frenchman knows better. So happy is he in his instinct for method that he can make even a catalogue of prints both useful and amusing; how much more a selection from the literature of which he is justly proud. M. Fasnacht has gleaned from the best critics of this century, from Vinet and Sainte-Beuve to Scherer and M. Faguet, the notices of writers, which explain their relation to their age, or weave the extracts from their works into an intelligible whole. The treatment of Racine may serve as an example. A brief biography is followed by selections from all the chief plays, introduced by critical remarks of Vinet, Paul de

Saint-Victor, Nisard, and M. Faguet; and then, for general estimates of Racine's works, we have Paul de Saint-Victor on Racine and Shakspeare, Taine on the influence of contemporary manners on the dramatist (a capital specimen of his criticism), and three pages of Sainte-Beuve on Racine's style. The editor's task has been one of selection. He has performed it with taste and judgment, effacing himself and leaving the word to others with a rare modesty. There is nothing superfluous; hardly a footnote trespasses on the province of philology. Sometimes, though rarely, we note a lapse from just proportion: for instance, we have ten pages of "Amphitryon," and barely one of "L'Avare." The scheme of the book, from the introductory analysis to the index, is entirely good. Anything that it contains can be found at a glance, so logical and lucid is the plan. The names of the critics are enough to prove that the book is much more than a primer for the purposes of "cramming."

A good way of using it would be to trace through it some single quality or method of French writers in successive ages. Their emulation of classical forms, the Roman satire and epistle, the Lucianic dialogue, or the fable, is obvious. More deeply rooted is their tendency to be didactic in the treatment of classical subjects—a tendency happily extinct, we hope, in the generation which has produced "Poèmes Antiques" and "Les Trophées." The French mind, with a decided affinity to the Latin, has seldom been capable of catching the spirit of Greek literature. Fénelon writes an imaginary conversation between Achilles and Homer in Elysium. Achilles begins, in the style of the "charmant cavalier, du meilleur ton," which he must have picked up among the "nymphes" of Seyros: "Je suis ravi, grand poète, d'avoir servi à t'immortaliser." He mentions his chief exploits: what a subject for a poet! To whom Homer:

"J'avoue que le sujet est beau, mais j'en aurais bien pu trouver d'autres. Une preuve qu'il y en a d'autres, c'est que j'en ai trouvé effectivement. Les aventures du sage et patient Ulysse valent bien la colère de l'impétueux Achille."

"Achille: Quoi? Comparer le rusé et trompeur Ulysse au fils de Thétis, plus terrible que Mars! Va poète ingrat, tu sentiras . . ."

"Homère: Tu as oublié que les ombres ne doivent point se mettre en colère. Une colère d'ombre n'est guère à craindre. Tu n'as plus d'autres armes à employer que de bonnes raisons."

That, unfortunately, was true—else would Achilles have silenced the dotard with a thrust of his spear; but that would have been a bad example for the Duc de Bourgogne. And so a sermon follows on the duties of princes as the patrons of literature, and the conclusion of the piece is as silly as the paltry squabble at the beginning.

"Homère: 'Adieu. Quand tu seras de plus belle humeur, je viendrai te chanter dans ce bocage certains endroits de l'Illiade: par exemple, la défaite des Grecs en ton absence,' &c."

After that a dose of Landor is the only restorative. The Abbé has indeed caught something of Homer's character—his trick of nodding.

Here is a more modern portrait of Achilles, drawn by Taine, who seems to have supposed that Phthia was one of the Cannibal Islands: "Regardez le véritable Achille, sauvage farouche, à la poitrine velue, qui voudrait manger le cœur et la chair crue d'Hector." Ah, no! That is not Achilles. "O Apolon! O Muses! profaner ainsi les sacrées Reliques de l'antiquité!" exclaims Du Bellay in his wise chapter, "Des mauvais Traducteurs, et de ne traduire les Poètes"; and with him we add: "Mais ie n'en diray autre chose."

It is to the study of the Roman classics that many of the good qualities of French prose are due. The standard of style and diction was deliberately fixed in the seventeenth century, and it has hardly varied since, so loyally has the same ideal been kept in view, through all legitimate progress. There were charming poets before Racine and Boileau, great writers of prose before Pascal and Bossuet. Voltaire exaggerates when he says that these four writers lifted the nation out of barbarism. But modern French literature, the only rival of the ancient classics in sincerity of purpose and purity of form, began with them. Their good example has been conscientiously followed.

"La langue française," says a writer not represented here, Guy de Maupassant, "est une eau pure que les écrivains manières n'ont jamais pu et ne pourront jamais troubler. Chaque siècle a jeté dans ce courant limpide ses modes, ses archaïsmes prétentieux et ses préciosités, sans que rien surnage de ces tentatives inutiles, de ces efforts impuissants. La nature de cette langue est d'être claire, logique et nerveuse. Elle ne se laisse pas affaiblir, obscurcir ou corrompre."

These are proud words. Could we dare to use them of our own English speech? Yet this book of select specimens of the great French writers can prove that they are strictly true.

CAMPBELL DODGSON.

The Liberation of Bulgaria. By Wentworth Huysho. (Bliss, Sands & Foster.)

MR. HUYSHO was war correspondent of the New York Herald with the Turkish army in 1877. These War Notes are a record of dolce far niente at Rustchuk, and subsequently of active service with Mehemed Ali. They also include a sketch of the siege of Plevna. The book tells an oft-told tale, but it tells it well. It combines the charm which only an eye-witness can give to narrative with that wisdom which comes after the event. In these pages are drawn with sympathy those familiar figures—the stupid old Turk Abdul Kerim, who, like Trochu, had his plan, but never told anyone what it was; Aziz Pasha, who fell honoured by friend and foe, fighting gloriously at Esirdsché; the courteous Mehemed Ali, who requested the correspondents to call the defeat at Cherkovna "an offensive reconnaissance of the Czarevitch's position"; and Osman Ghazi, who, in the generous language of Skobeleff, will for ever remain

"Osman the Victorious (Ghazi), in spite of his surrender."

There are two propositions which Mr. Huysho is mainly interested in proving—the one the skill of Osman, the other the treachery of Suleiman. The tale of the rise and fall of Plevna is as interesting in its way as that of the siege of Troy. In July, 1877, the Russians entered in triumph Tirnova, the ancient capital of Bulgaria. From the Danube to the Balkans the way lay open to them; there seemed to be no lion in their path. But when Krudener marched on Nicopolis, he omitted to protect his flank by occupying Plevna, a mere open village. He soon found out that one Osman of Widdin had seized and fortified Plevna, and made it impregnable to assault. Plevna—unlike Sebastopol, with which the name of his great opponent Todleben is for ever associated—had no harbour, no dockyards, no arsenal, no great forts of masonry. Plevna was "only a little town lying in the downs, girt about with trenches and redoubts." She owes her place in history to the genius of one man. But even an Osman could not have kept the Russian advance in check for one week, much less four months, had it not been for the men he led, the rank and file of the Turkish army. Since Adam delved no soldier has used the spade with such good will as the Turk. "In the use of the field telegraph and the construction of military roads and earthworks the Turks, in 1877, were on a level with the most advanced powers in Europe." The severely intellectual type of Osman's features have more in them of the man of contemplation than of action. The contrast between his face and that of Todleben, also a handsome man, is striking enough.

We will now touch briefly on Mr. Huysho's second proposition—viz., that had Suleiman Pasha not been a traitor to his country, Mehemed Ali would have broken through the Czarevitch's line and have raised the siege of Plevna. This would have been tantamount to a Russian retreat across the Danube, and a Russian retreat would have meant the re-establishment of the Sultan's authority in Bulgaria. The last two hundred pages of this book are a record of an eye-witness of the advance and final defeat of the Turks under Mehemed Ali. A glance at the two sketch maps discloses the situation. Mehemed Ali's plan, unlike the undisclosed plan of his predecessor, was clear enough and (in the absence of treachery) quite feasible. Osman was to stand firm in the west, while Mehemed would hew his way through the Czarevitch's army from the east. The Russians were to be ground between two mill-stones. For the success, however, of his plan it was necessary that Mehemed should have the larger battalions on his side. This was impossible without the co-operation of Suleiman, who refused to co-operate. During the war, correspondents, who naturally objected to be shot, were muzzled on this nefarious transaction. The evidence, however, of Suleiman's treason is overwhelming. Mr. Huysho had better speak for himself:

"Suleiman, it was notorious, fought for his own hand in the Shipka Pass; he did his best to win his own battles and to prevent Mehemed Ali from deriving any benefit from them. He would not come through the Balkans (as he might have done with the greatest ease at any time) and join his chief in striking at the Czarevitch's line: his 'interests' lay in uselessly hammering away at the pass which the Russians held. The Sublime Porte, in its suicidal sublimity, turned a deaf ear to Mehemed's entreaties, and did not order Suleiman to obey his superior officer. . . . Thus ambition at the front and intrigue at the Palace destroyed the finest opportunity a commander ever had to crush his country's enemies. That with Suleiman's army added to his own Mehemed Ali could have raised the siege of Plevna, is as certain as anything could be."

Mr. Huysho tells us that in 1877 "evidences of Turkish oppression and tyranny were difficult to discover in the midst of the material prosperity which the Bulgarians enjoyed." He will agree with us that there would have been no difficulty in discovering "evidences of Turkish oppression and tyranny," had the Turks emerged victorious from the life-and-death struggle with Russia. The prospect, in fact, is too awful to contemplate, and heaven be thanked that a reconquered Bulgaria is among the ghastly "might have beens" of history. The Bulgarian, when he honours with gratitude the gallant Russians and Roumanians who laid down their lives in the trenches round Plevna, has also cause to remember the selfishness and treachery of Suleiman Pasha.

J. G. C. MINCHIN.

Songs of Zion by Hebrew Singers of Mediaeval Times. Translated into English Verse by Mrs. Henry Lucas. (Dent.)

THE aristocratic contempt with which too many Christian theologians regard Judaism is difficult to maintain in the presence of the religious poetry of the Jews. Reading the old mediaeval hymns, we feel how much we are at one with their authors in our deepest thoughts and aspirations; and when troubled with the dogmatic disputes of the day we escape with delight into the pure, warm atmosphere of old Jewish poetry.

Unfortunately for most of us, the hymns of Solomon ibn Gabirol, Jehuda Hallevi, and the other gifted members of the Jewish choir, are in a style which, even to Hebrew scholars, is difficult from its artificial character. Sachs, however, has shown how possible it is for a true poet to reproduce the originals with essential fidelity and considerable impressiveness; and his translations from the Spanish hymn-writers (Berlin, 1845), accompanied by historical and biographical notices, deserve a place of honour among religious classics.

To Mrs. Henry Lucas we are indebted for a charmingly printed little volume, not so heavy as a Common Prayerbook, containing twenty-five translations from the choicest mediaeval singers, which, though they can hardly vie with those of Sachs in fidelity, are yet as near to the originals as the exacting genius of our language and prosody admits. The first in order is the famous Ode to Zion, which, according to tradition, Jehuda Hallevi composed at the gates of Jerusalem. Beyond doubt this is the most successful of Mrs. Lucas's translations; and the peculiar combination of realism and idealism which pervades both it and so many other Jewish poems, and which reminds us of Dante, makes it specially attractive. Of the hymns which follow we may say to Christian students, as Mr. Zangwill's Raphael Leon says to his fellow Jews, "Why go to Browning for theism?"

If this book should do something to diminish the prejudice which still keeps Christians and Jews asunder, and hinders them from learning from each other, it will have done even better than merely adding to our store of fine religious poetry. An etching of the ancient synagogue of Toledo forms the frontispiece.

A Woman's Love Lesson. By Emily J. Durham. In 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

Lot 13. By Dorothea Gerard. In 3 vols. (Innes.)

Mrs. Bouverie. By F. C. Philips. In 2 vols. (Downey.)

The Vengeance of Medea. By E. G. Wheelwright. (Digby, Long & Co.)

The Eccentrics. By Percy Ross. In 3 vols. (Digby, Long & Co.)

Sir Simon Vanderpetter and Mending his Ancestors. By B. B. West. (Longmans.)

An Agitator. By Clementina Black. (Bliss, Sands & Foster.)

By Reef and Palm. By Louis Becke. (Fisher Unwin.)

IN Miss Durham's story there is much quiet power of a kind not expected from an amateur or a beginner, and the lack of evidence to the contrary obliges one to suppose that she is both. But the open-eyed way in which she faces the problems of love proclaims her experienced, if not in literature, at least in life. Here is no jangle of wedding-bells on the last page, leading (or misleading) one to imagine that all discords and jarring notes are of the past, and that the future will be all harmony. Yet Miss Durham does not lend herself to the nauseous problems of married life with which a certain type of book and play so commonly reeks. That to be true to life one need not be nasty, is a gospel too little preached. Miss Durham bravely shows how the large hopes and promised happiness of the wooing time fade away when grim and ugly realities stalk in between the married lovers, and how then there is danger of two ruined lives. But she believes in the love that can recover itself after storms; and so Anna and her husband, after bitter separation and shame, find that marriage is a stronger bond than the gossamer threads of love-making, and that there is a truer happiness in mutual help than in mutual idolising. Of the secondary characters, Anna's pompous but empty father, and the curate to whom Anna engages herself as a matter of routine and duty, and who nobly gives her up when he finds that she loves Basil Morno, are perhaps the most striking.

"Lot 13," which gives to Miss Gerard's book its title, is the name of a sugar plantation in the West Indies left by a dying man to his relative and enemy. The legatee is delighted, and only when he takes possession of his property does he find the true significance of the bequest. Lot 13 is, and always has been, merely a pit into which to throw money. But the new owner takes the "cane fever" badly, and continues to pour down his scanty resources till fortune, in a most unexpected way, comes to his aid. The scenery is new in fiction; and one breathes distinctly now and then the luscious air, laden with sweets and spices, of the tropics. But the chief feature of the book is the determined character-sketching Miss Gerard has indulged in. Each person is not merely an individual, but a study in some special quality or lack of quality. Sybil Durrant is perhaps the most determined, though not the most successful, of these studies. In drawing her, Miss Gerard falls foul of the generally accepted theory that the outer man is the expression of the inner. In a girl of magnificent proportions, of commanding feature and gesture, she puts the soul of—less than a mouse. The girl is passionately loved by the young hero of the story before he knows better, and when her parents tell her that she may, she loves him; but the instant that circumstances decide for them that she may not, she leaves off loving him. Better things are of course waiting for Bernard Berrington as soon as he awakes from his dream of her.

Mr. F. C. Philips is one of the writers who have been charged with being "groovy." He invented Lena Despard, and then went on producing replicas until the type became too familiar. At Mrs. Bouverie's first appearance, tripping across the garden to the boy Frank, with the impress of style and fashion on her from her almost invisible bonnet to her dainty toes, you more than half suspect another replica. But Mrs. Bouverie is Lena Despard with a difference—she is Lena washed and made clean within and without. Indeed, Mr. Philips's endeavours after the irreproachably moral descend into dullness now and then; yet at the end of the book you arise with a genuine feeling of pity and sympathy for Mrs. Bouverie, whose good sense and—must it be said?—conscience have prevented her from snatching a great present happiness at the expense of the future. The chief interest centres in Mrs. Bouverie and Frank, and the other characters are ordinary. Mr. Philips has now shown, however, that he is not limited to one groove.

It is to be regretted that "the Poetess," who is the central figure in The Vengeance of Medea, should hold forth at such unwarrantable length upon matters moral, matrimonial, and social. She would be so very much more convincing if she did not. As it is, in spite of herself, she leaves the impression of an earnest half-inspired being, un être à part, on the reader's mind. The plot is nothing out of the common, the Poetess is the one important feature in the book, and it is only fair to her to admit her supremacy. But it is something new in a novel when a young and beautiful and supreme woman, in the post of heroine, is not provided with a lover. One quite understands, and at the same time wonders, how this happens—how it is that Leslie Vernon loves not her, but the bright-haired Sybil at her side. Apropos of this Sybil, there is an unpleasantly hard and brassy suspicion about the "golden eyes" given to her by the author, and forced in season and out of season upon the unwilling reader.

It is difficult to see why The Eccentrics was written, unless the writer wished to set his readers the puzzle of finding out who the "eccentrics" are. The marriage relations of Hermann Lazarus and Renée Mordant are anything but smooth and pleasant; but that is hardly an eccentricity. The only really unusual persons in the book are a charming young lady of Greek features, sylvan habits, and an absolutely untouched heart, and a certain Mr. Berners French, who claims to be a gentleman, but behaves in a railway carriage as no gentleman could do. These two persons may have some claim to the title, but they fill subordinate places in the story.

Miss Edgeworth wrote Moral Tales in all seriousness; but Mr. West, though in his preface he claims that title for his two stories, Sir Simon Vanderpetter and Mending his Ancestors, seems rather to regard the matter as an immense joke. His Sir Simon Vanderpetter, descended from a long line of pious, decorous, church-going ancestors, of Dutch origin, is a cuckoo egg, a mongrel, a sport. He reminds one a little of Dorian Grey, in that he remained slender and exquisite and innocent-looking, while all the time "he gambled with dice and with horses; he frothed and fumed, and swore and bullied; he ruined the characters and peace of peasant girls; he drank and brawled." When money and credit fail him, there suddenly appears to him a personage who calls himself Baron Bell von Zebub, and considerably furnishes him with money and with a cargo of obvious, public, paying virtues, in exchange for the usual worthless soul. How in the end the Baron is excellently outwitted Mr. West must tell. The second story is in the same strain, but is, perhaps, more pleasing. There is a certain breeziness in the style which carries the reader quickly along.

One has not at the first introduction much sympathy with Miss Black's agitator, Christopher Brand. He is narrow, he knows life in only one aspect, and he works in an embittered way, determined to snatch a begrudged justice for a down-trodden people whom in his very much sealed-up heart he rather despises. Driven from place to place, feared and not much liked even by his fellow-workers, he at last somehow makes a success, and is elected a member of parliament. There is foul play at the election, suspicion falls on Brand, and he finds himself in prison an innocent man. It is here that he works out his own salvation with tears. His bitterness melts away, and his heart is full of love towards the people he still means to spend his life for. Miss Black writes from the point of view of a person in sympathy with the general principles of agitators, but her agitator, in being throughout single-minded and honest, stands almost alone among his confrères.

Regret was lately expressed in some quarters that Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson did not write stories about the islands of the Pacific in the manner of Mr. Louis Becke. I, for one, am glad that he did not. From Mr. Stevenson's stories one does not rise with a sick taste in the mouth and a new-born distrust in human nature. There is hardly one of Mr. Becke's tales in which low passion, heartless betrayal, or brutal abandonment is not the central point. The white man has come as a curse to the Polynesian woman. She lavishes her love upon him, and he plays with her and leaves her—or kills her. Yet in Mr. Becke's style there is charm and verisimilitude. You breathe the air and eat the fruits of the fair islands of the Pacific. The glorious sea is round you, and the gentle, simple people; but in it all there is a taint, a rotten horror, and, according to Mr. Becke, that is human nature.

GEORGE COTTERELL.

SOME RECENT VERSE.

ONE is continually hearing that nobody reads poetry. Yet it would seem to be a profitable investment for the publishers. Every week half a score of unknown song-makers pipe to the public. Slender's plaintive bleat over his missing book of songs and sonnets has stirred every man to be his own poet; so that when occasion for tender lyrical quotations arises, he may not stand speechless but find to hand a sufficient quantity of metrical compliments. Scarcely less remarkable than the large yield is the really excellent quality of the vintage. In the present bundle of verse there is hardly one book that has not choice, if slight, merits of its own. And two, at least—those of Mr. Gosse and Mr. Herbert—have very notable and rare qualities.

In Russett and Silver. By Edmund Gosse. (Heinemann.) Mr. Gosse has never written better—for our own part, we would even venture to say so well—before. He reminds us that he is no longer a young man:

"Tho' I'm blithe and boisterous yet,
With all my cronies round me set,
There enters one who's really young
And I grow grey. My knell has rung."

But "the menace of advancing years" finds Mr. Gosse unafraid and jubilant. Contentment is not a common virtue: a cheery outlook across life, past and present, is only kept by the very wise and sane. Mr. Gosse has earned an eminent place in English letters, and this volume only deepens our respect. Often enough, his views and opinions have been attacked, nor was the fault always on one side; but In Russett and Silver is a book all responsible and critical persons should be grateful for. The work is sound, the thought is sensible. Moreover, in the dedication Mr. Gosse has invented a melody of haunting beauty, such as Tusitala himself had found it hard to equal. It is too long to give in full, too delicate to quote in part.

The King's Last Vigil. By Lady Lindsay. (Kegan Paul & Co.) So much applause has been showered on this little book that it is not easy to speak temperately. It is unpleasant to seem ungracious; but, at the risk of being thought so, we must differ with the more ardent critics. Much of the book is only magazine verse: poetry by courtesy. Fluency is by no means the merit many would suppose, else were Lady Lindsay in the front rank of poets.

Too often, indeed, it trends towards a clumsy double-shuffle, as amazing to the spectators as it should be embarrassing to the dancer. Lady Lindsay's work, to speak very frankly, needs the nervous care that fosters all great achievements in art and letters. She is a poetess of real charm: it is easy to concede so much, but as yet she cannot claim exalted rank. If she would only be cautious and remember that there are some rules that take bitter revenges on their traducers, we believe she would do good work, for she has fancy and fervour, though distinction at intervals only. The personal note is struck often, but never firmly enough to create a definite impression. Here is fine material spoilt by rough usage. The singer whose voice is untrained finds the noblest music beyond her reach. Lady Lindsay must be content to pipe of small events, or else take heed to the mechanism of her work. The latter were the wiser plan, for she has in her the makings of a fine poet; and it were wicked to disguise from one so gifted the faults that at present go far to spoil her most exquisite achievements.

Here and there Lyrics. By E. A. N. (Liverpool: Howell.) The author of this little booklet is a neat humorist, and follows, as regards form, carefully and not inelegantly the Calverley tradition. The collection makes good reading, and should find plenty of admirers. The author has wit, fluency, and fancy; and though the matter is often trivial enough, his work is, for the most part, literature.

Baeder the Poet. By George Herbert Stockbridge. (G. P. Putnam's Sons.) The American minor poet is not nearly so fortunate as his English cousin. His works are less elaborately bound, and they are seldom such good reading. Not a Britisher on our list but would shy at such rhyming as:

"Hold the complete ring;
Then ataya the fleeting Power, though it hideth;
So love abideth."

Mr. Stockbridge, however, atones for this sin by some admirable little dialect poems, and the Balder songs are able.

Epictetus, and Other Poems. By David Davenport. (Bell.) Mr. Davenport would seem to be a man of culture, for his verse concerns itself greatly with learned themes. He is not without courage, wrestling with the most beautiful Bible stories. Doubtless, many will be pleased by his pious labours; for our own part, we are inclined to resent this meddlesome habit. For one beautiful hymn, "Thou who madest earth so fair," we give Mr. Davenport our sincere thanks.

Irish Nónins. By Patrick Joseph McCall. (Dublin: Seeley, Bryers & Walker.) This shabby looking little volume holds a good measure of genuine poetry. Few recent books of verse have chanted to us a braver song than "The bonny brown-haired girl whom I love." Those who do not know that fine old tune, "The fair hills of Ireland," to which the poem is admirably wedded, will at least be fascinated by the quaint lilt of Mr. McCall's lyric. Here are a couple of stanzas:

"Ah! God be with the mornings, when my love
And I went Maying,
Through the silent, heathery Glen of Imaile;
When the dawn o'er Lugnaquilla, like a fairy host arraying,
Chased the flying elves of night, down the Vale!"

"Still the fairies peep and play, on this twinkling
May day—
Still the elfin bands sink vanishing, before the bright array;
But, alas, my sweet maiden is far, far away—
The bonnie brown-haired girl, whom I love!"

Sagas and Songs of the Norsemen. By A. F. Major. (David Nutt.) This book strikes a lustier note than we are accustomed to hear in modern poetry. Sometimes it develops into mere noise, but on the whole the work is vigorous and bracing. The weapon songs are of exceptionable merit, worthy of being sung by the grim old warriors in the hour of victory. We hope Mr. Major will not write any more dull poems on Senlac. When he touches English soil, save in the guise of a conquering Viking, he is lamentably dull and unreadable. But the force and skill of his best work is unmistakable. These lines from "A Shield Song" are characteristic:

"From my first fight in youth
O'er the field I rode glorious,
On my broad shield uplifted
By warriors victorious:
With a clash of their swords,
While the brown strand was reeking
With the blood of the foeman,
They greeted the sea-king."

Love Lyrics. By Alan Stanley. (Gay & Bird.) The faults in this tiny volume seem to be those of youth and inexperience, which will, therefore, work their own cure. Mr. Stanley manages some difficult metres very deftly, he expresses his thoughts felicitously, and shows genuine poetical feeling. He should beware of too prodigal a use of epithets, and not weary us with so frequent a display of "gold" and "ivory." But he has skill and taste. The following verses, "At Monaco," are a fair example of the whole:

"The waves upon the low beach play,
An amber moon sails o'er the sea,
Upon the cliffs in stately row
The lights of the casino glow,
While far away
The band sighs forth a melody."

"O come, beloved, unto me
And lean your cheek again on mine,
For love is in the air to-night,
And you were made for my delight,
So let it be,
It only I be made for thine."

Windfall and Water-drift. By Auberon Herbert. (Williams & Norgate.) Mr. Herbert has some of the best qualities of the poet, but he is often a clumsy craftsman. False rhymes and halting stanzas, however, irritate only when they occur in the works of the overweening and pompous. We become, too, somewhat suspicious of mere technical conjuring, when we so seldom find it allied to thought and feeling. Mr. Herbert seems to have written, not that he might show that he, too, was among the prophets, but because he was compelled to write. Each poem is only two, or at most three, verses long, and the form of them is old-fashioned enough. Yet in the half-dozen completely successful efforts there is a rare directness of expression and true depth of feeling. The man who can write like this is a poet:

"It wasn't worth much, as we understand,
The heart of a wild rash boy;
And it wasn't worth while to stretch your hand
To trifle with such a toy.
Ah me! that heart has been lost and given,
Oh! many a day since then;
But 'twill never be given on this side Heaven
In the same true way again."

This is not first among the half-dozen best; but it is enough, we hope, to send readers to the volume. They will find much in it slovenly and poor, but the gems are of sufficient value to stimulate a diligent search.

PERCY ADDLESHAW.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Out of Egypt. By Percy Hemingway. (Elkin Mathewa.) This is a strong book, albeit not the best disposed critic can with any truth call it a pleasant one. It has in it the note of a certain originality of theme, nor is originality of treatment wholly lacking in it. It consists of a novel in miniature—not a short story proper, but longer than that, and built on altogether different lines—and of a series of extremely brief sketches, which deal with the Egyptians, the longer work (called "Gregario") making us acquainted with not a few of the characteristic features of the Greeks in Egypt. Alike in the long story—the miniature novel, as we have already called it—and in those very brief papers which we must liken to outdoor sketches, Mr. Hemingway, who clearly knows his subject thoroughly, writes with directness, with vigour, and, it must be said, with no other charm than that not inconsiderable one which directness and vigour afford. The writing has some sense of youth about it, some suggestion of literary, though not of mental, immaturity—the distinction is worth making. Often, in "Gregario" especially, Mr. Hemingway, though simple and direct, yet fails to be terse; for, in his order of brevity, there is a measure of inexpressive baldness; and, again, in his amplitude, there is somehow not always the convincing detail of reality. But that his manner should seem to us worth analysis or definition, is of itself perhaps some evidence that we hold his book to be the work of a capable man, from whom there should come in later days productions of more complete art. In "Gregario"—which "bulks," as publishers say, to about two-thirds of Out of Egypt—Mr. Hemingway certainly manages to be interesting; but, if we seek the sources of his interest, we find them to be threefold, and not all of them equally honourable: the first is in his knowledge of a strange land (a source of interest which it is obvious is neither a merit nor a fault); the second is in the direct and manly way in which, as we have said before, he presents his record; and the third is in the unusual and sensational nature of his subject-matter. The main theme of "Gregario" is really the story of the temptation a poor devil of a Greek lay under to lend his wife to an Englishman for money. Without beating about the bush, that is really the story; and it is some witness to the art by which it is conducted to say that this repulsive tale is so presented that you do not loathe the Greek to the extent to which in like case you would loathe a being less darkened and less unfortunate. Mr. Hemingway has understood the circumstances of that modern Alexandrian life, and has viewed it with a tolerance we might not have been able to emulate. Just in one of the later sketches this new author, leaving the sensational and the horrible, which so quickly attract, has been concerned for once with even the wholly uneventful. He has flung away his swimming belt; but the waters have proved too much for him. The art which is vouchsafed to but very few writers, to attract and retain us when there is no tale, but only the manner and the personality, the style, and l'homme même, is not at present his. But we have implied, we trust, that his work, when executed upon more ordinary methods, is of a kind that performs not a little and that promises more.

Thoughts of William Ewart Gladstone. Edited by G. Barnett Smith. (Ward, Lock & Co.). There are no limits to the industry of Mr. Barnett Smith. He exhausts libraries in his search for fresh material, and the present book is a monument of his literary labours. To review the book would be as impossible as to attempt to summarise Mr. Gladstone's speeches and writings in a few sentences. We have here ample proof of the versatility and charm of Mr. Gladstone's mind. Politics are strictly eschewed. With most politicians, to eliminate all allusion to party politics would leave them poor indeed; there is little else of note to record in their written or spoken utterances. With Mr. Gladstone it is far otherwise. He is equally interesting whether he is eulogising Lord Beaconsfield or Homer, contrasting Macaulay with Carlyle, or criticising the poetry of Leopardi and Tennyson. The book is a storehouse of thought. It can be recommended as a suitable Christmas present for grown-up people.

Noble Womanhood. By G. Barnett Smith. (S.P.C.K.) The following representative women are here portrayed in a series of biographical sketches—Princess Alice, Florence Nightingale, Frances Ridley Havergal, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Sister Dora, Louisa Mary Alcott, Elizabeth Fry, and Mrs. Hemans. Of these, perhaps, the least known in England is Miss Alcott, and Mr. Barnett Smith's sketch of her is worth reading. It may surprise some to hear that the last books read by Miss Havergal were The Earth's Formation on Dynamical Principles by Prof. Ritchie, and Goodwin's "Works." She was only forty-two when she died, but her life was noble and full. Another devoted woman was Sister Dora, whose work at Walsall is too well known to require any eulogy.

From the Clyde to the Jordan. By H. Callan. (Blackie.) This is the narrative of a bicycle journey. There is a good deal of information in the book, but it is rather marred by occasional attempts at fine writing. Nor is the style always to be commended, as may be seen by the following sentence taken at haphazard: "And yet tell not a Tiroler that he is the same as a Corinthian, nor he as a Carnioler, nor he as a Croat, nor he as a Slav, nor a Slav as a Serb." Philippopolis is, no doubt, a most interesting and picturesque town; but in describing such a city there is no need to import extraneous and foreign matter, after stating that this is not "the plains of Philippi." Mr. Callan cannot resist the temptation of moralising on "the murky scene in Shakspeare" and on "Caesar's Ghost." He also complains that he found no Lydia to shelter him, referring, of course, to "that grand old missionary, Paul," and his visit to quite a different town. Bulgaria is of the present day; Asia Minor is still of the past. With his intimate acquaintance with the Bible, Mr. Callan must have found his run through Phrygia, Anatolia, and Cilicia intensely interesting; and his account of this part of his journey is quite the best part of his narrative. He says, truly enough, that "to one who has come from the rude fare, hard couching, and primitive manners of a less enlightened land, Jerusalem is a surprise, a delight." It is otherwise to one who comes direct from Belgravia.

The Greenland and the Pole. By Gordon Stables. (Blackie.) This is a story of adventure in the Arctic regions, and the title in itself is a recommendation. Who does not enjoy tales of adventures, and who is not interested in Arctic explorers? The author again writes from personal experience. As he tells us in his preface, "we [i.e., Joe and himself] roughed it together years and years ago, in and on the Sea of Ice." Another of the characters, Rudland Syme, is the portrait of a Greenland surgeon; and Sigurd, the Norwegian, is a real live sailor. Dr. Stables has made use of his own journals, but acknowledges his indebtedness to The First Crossing of Greenland, by Nansen, to whom, indeed, he dedicates the book, "with wishes and prayers for his safe return." There is an excellent map of the circumpolar regions, and some attractive illustrations by Mr. G. C. Hindley.

A Double Cherry. By M. E. Winchester. (Seeley.) Miss Winchester's stories are deservedly favourites with children, and she has perhaps never written anything better than this pathetic tale. The cherries are two little boys left alone in Liverpool by the death of their father—a proud and penniless gentleman of ancient lineage. The elder boy, Claude, is a noble little fellow; and the story of how he gets into disgrace and is sent to the reformatory ship Akbar will interest every child. Captain and Mrs. Rowse are delightful people, and we can only hope they are drawn from life. Certainly the description of what took place on board the ship bears on it the impress of truth. The book is as full of remarkable incidents as any that Mr. Rider Haggard ever wrote, and, indeed, not a few of them remind one of that popular writer. We can confidently recommend this book as one of the best which the season has produced.

Afterthought House. By E. Everett Green. (S.P.C.K.) Humphrey Mainwaring is a quaint, philosophical child, such as Mrs. Ewing drew with yet greater skill in her delightful stories. The way in which he grew to be a companion to his father—a stern, middle-aged, Indian general—is well told; and the advent of the two young American cousins adds some life to the scenes depicted, although their talk has not a true Transatlantic flavour about it. The breaking of the reservoir wall gives an opportunity for deeds of heroism, which are recounted with spirit; but, as a whole, the story is rather flat.

John's Lily. By Eleanor C. Price. (Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.) A very superior blacksmith finds by the roadside a deserted child. He adopts her, and beneath his roof she grows up, loved and loving. She is the child of rich parents, and had been stolen by tramps, who, in the hope of a reward, make a further attempt to gain possession of her. Of course all ends well; and if the situations are improbable, that is the worst that can be said about them, and children are not likely to say it.

The Disagreeable Duke. By Ellinor Davenport Adams. (George Allen.) If a Duke is so disagreeable as not to let you have a fir-tree for a Christmas school treat, why, what can children of a benevolent turn do but go and steal one from his plantations? But if, when you bring your tree home in the dark you find that you have stolen the wrong kind of tree, what is to be done then? Clearly nothing. The only solution of the difficulty is for the disagreeable Duke to die, and this he very kindly does just in the very nick of time. As the new Duke is not disagreeable but a nice little boy, the matter is easily arranged, with the help of his good-natured agent. Such is the outline of this feeble little story, and we are sorry to say that the filling-up is not much better than the outline.

Led by Love. By M. A. Paull. (Hodder.) This book begins with a sermon and continues in a serious strain throughout. Having said this, we can recommend it as a gift-book for girls who have been brought up in evangelical families. It tells the story of two sisters, Mary and Gertrude Wilson, and how they were wooed and won. It is the old story of Mary and Martha—the ideal and the practical. The tone of the book throughout is good. We will content ourselves with quoting the concluding sentence: "But God, Love's essence, whose name is Love, is the Magnet of the universe, for of Him and through Him and to Him are all things."

Winifred Leighton. By H. S. Streatfield. (S.P.C.K.) With the best intentions on the part of the author, this story is oppressively moral. All the characters are creatures quite "too wise and good for human nature's daily food." Even the reprobates are speedily taught to turn over a new leaf, and happily married; while at the end there is a general distribution of good things, wives, children and prosperity. The reader would welcome a hardened burglar or the like, but cannot help envying Miss Streatfield her optimism.

Primroses, by M. Bell (S.P.C.K.), is a fresh and pretty story, as welcome as the flowers which give it a name. The old-fashioned farm and the benevolent uncle match each other, and the children are natural and not impossibly good.

The Orderly Officer. By H. Avery. (S.P.C.K.) With some noteworthy reminiscences of the Indian Mutiny is interwoven a clever little story of the good a child can do. Mr. Avery ought to be heard of again.

Denny Dick. By Mary Bell. (S.P.C.K.) A pretty but slight story of active charity. Fathers in Australia appear to be easily satisfied with the identity of their lost sons.

Paul's Partner. By M. Roding (S.P.C.K.). This shows how a kind action may lead to much happiness.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. GEORGE ALLEN, of Ruskin House, will publish shortly the Reminiscences of Judge O'Connor Morris. The work, which will bear the name of Pot Pourri, deals chiefly with Ireland and the Irish Question during the last half century, but also with Oxford, Dublin, and London society, and with men of letters of the time.

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES, son and executor of the late Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, asks that any persons having letters by his father will send them to Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., 4, Park-street, Boston, or to Mr. A. P. Watt, Hastings House, Norfolk-street, Strand, with a view to their possible use in a contemplated "Life and Letters of Dr. Holmes." These letters will be carefully returned to their owners, after copies have been made of such as are found to be available.

FRESH light in many respects is likely to be thrown on Domesday Book in a work which Mr. Horace Round intends to publish in the spring. Other early surveys will also figure in it, one of them, it is believed, as yet unknown. The contents of the work, however, are by no means restricted to this subject, as it deals with many points of political and institutional history, from the middle of the eleventh century to the close of the twelfth. Messrs. Swan, Sonnenschein & Co. will publish the work.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish immediately a book on The Training of Girls for Work, by Edith A. Barnett, whose opinions derive weight from her own experience of professional life. She has something to say about the health of girls, girls' schools, a girl's character, household work, professional work, professional wages, the girls' money, marriage, and the girls' mothers.

THE Rev. R. H. Charles, editor of the Book of Enoch, is about to publish at the Clarendon Press, in the "Anecdota Oxoniensia" series, the Ethiopic Version of the Hebrew Book of Jubilees (otherwise known among the Greeks as Ἡ Ἀληθὴς Γένεσις) edited from four MSS., critically revised through a continuous comparison of the Massoretic and Samaritan texts, and the Greek, Syriac, Vulgate, and Ethiopic Versions of the Pentateuch, and further amended and restored in accordance with the Hebrew, Syriac, Greek and Latin Fragments of this Book, which are here published in full. The present text is based on the two great MSS. in the British Museum and the Bibliothèque Nationale, supplemented by the two MSS. upon which Dillmann's edition was founded, and by new materials which have since come to light. In the continuous comparison of the Ethiopic Version of "Jubilees" with the Hebrew and Samaritan texts and the various versions of the Pentateuch, the editor has gradually come to recognise the immense value of the Book of Jubilees as a witness to the Hebrew text that was current in Palestine in the century immediately preceding the Christian era. The Hebrew author of this book had before him a text that in scores of passages is at variance with the Massoretic, and in many passages is unquestionably earlier and purer. Of these various facts account has been duly taken in the Notes, and the results have been briefly summarised in the Introduction.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & Co. have in the press a book entitled The Teaching of the Vedas: what light does it throw on the origin and development of religion, by the Rev. Maurice Phillips, of the London Mission at Madras.

MR ELLIOT STOCK announces The Reunion of Christendom in Apostolic Succession for the Evangelisation of the World, by the Rev. William Earle; and Education and Life in the United States, by Selina Hadland.

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS will shortly begin the publication of a serial, in monthly numbers, to be entitled Little Journeys. Each number will contain a description of a recent visit made by Mr. Elbert Hubbard to the home and haunts of some well-known author. The first group of authors whose homes are to be described are: George Eliot, Carlyle, Ruskin, Gladstone, Turner, Swift, Victor Hugo, Wordsworth, Thackeray, Dickens, Shakspere, and Goldsmith.

THE frontispiece in photogravure, entitled "Galloway Fastnesses," to the new illustrated edition of The Stickit Minister is by Mr. Dnnholm Young. This edition also contains a facsimile of the MS. of one of Mr. R. L. Stevenson's latest poems.

THE value of the personal estate of Walter Pater, who died intestate, has been sworn at £2493.

THE first meeting of the committee formed to raise a fund for the Carlyle centenary memorial was held on Wednesday of this week. Mr. Leslie Stephen was appointed chairman. The receipts up to the present amount to £600, including the donation of £100 from the German Emperor; but a further sum of about £2000 is still required. Efforts are to be made to hold a public meeting early in the new year, when the Earl of Rosebery and Mr. Bayard, the American Ambassador, are to be asked to speak.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

PROF. MAX MÜLLER will contribute to the January number of the Jewish Quarterly Review a memoir of the late James Darmesteter. The article also contains a review of the present condition of Zend studies.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN will deal in the January number of the National Review with some of the criticisms that have been passed on his Old Age Pensions Scheme.

THE last verses by Mr. R. L. Stevenson to reach this country will appear in the forthcoming number of the New Review, which makes its first appearance under the editorship of Mr. William Ernest Henley towards the close of the present month. The poem, which is entitled "The Woodman" and dated Vailima, is a moving allegory of life, written in octosyllabics, amounting altogether to 144 lines. It is expected that an appreciation of Mr. Stevenson's art, by Mr. William Archer, will appear in the same issue. Sir Charles Dilke contributes the first of a series of twelve articles on the Naval League, and Mr. Frederick Greenwood writes on the Anglo-Russian rapprochement. The relations between England and France will be discussed by M. Emile Ollivier, in the French tongue. On the Armenian question, "A Diplomatist" will represent, it is believed, the views of the late Sir William White. Mr. W. S. Lilly treats of "The Problem of Purity," Mr. C. F. Keary gives "Impressions of India," Mr. G. S. Street "A Eulogy of Charles II.," and Mr. G. W. Stevens a note on the new Ibsen. In fiction there will be the first three chapters of "The Time Machine," a romance and forecast, by Mr. H. G. Wells; and "The Next House," one of a series of "Little Stories about Women," by George Fleming.

THE January number of the Century will contain an article upon Canton Life and Chinese punishments by Mr. Florence O'Driscoll; and an account, by Mr. Hiram Maxim, of his experiments in aerial navigation, profusely illustrated.

THE forthcoming number of the Asiatic Quarterly Review will have for illustrations a Persian chronogram for 1895 and a Japanese symbolic New Year's wish. Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett writes upon the war between China and Japan; Sir Roper Lethbridge upon progress in Mysore; Parbati Charan Roy upon permanent as against temporary settlements in India; Mr. Ion Perdicaris upon the situation in Morocco; and Capt. Pasfield Oliver on the Hova view of the Madagascar question.

THE new volume of the Sunday Magazine, which begins with the January number, will contain a serial story by Miss Christabel Coleridge, entitled "The Tender Mercies of the Good." There will also be a series of four papers, by Mr. F. T. Richards, on "The Eve of Christianity; or, The World as St. Paul found it."

THE January number of the Antiquary (the first issue of the new and cheaper series), will include the following articles: "Ancient Book-binding," by the editor; "The Rodney Chalice," by Mr. W. Cripps; "Manx Folk-lore," by the Rev. A. W. Moore.

THE January number of Cassell's Magazine will contain an article on "Royal Keepsakes," which has been written by special permission, illustrated with photographs of presents to the Queen; a complete story by Mr. Grant Allen, and a collotype plate produced from an original drawing by G. L. Seymour.

THE new volume of Chambers's Journal, which begins with the part to be published towards the end of January, will contain a new serial by Anthony Hope, entitled "The Chronicles of Count Antonio"; and also short stories and articles by A. Conan Doyle, S. R. Crockett, S. Baring Gould, G. Manville Fenn, R. Francillon, L. T. Meade, &c.

M. PAUL VERLAINE contributes a poem entitled "La Classe" to the New Year's number of the Senate, which will also contain a poem by Dr. Gordon Hake and stories by Mr. Walter Pollock and others.

MR. GILBERT PARKER has finished a new novel, entitled "The Seats of the Mighty," which will commence in the Young Man for January. This number will also contain an illustrated character sketch of Mr. John Morley, by Dr. Charles A. Berry, an article on "The Study of Poetry," by Mr. Richard Le Gallienne, and contributions by Dr. Marcus Dods, Mr. Barry Pain, Dr. Joseph Parker, &c.

THE Quiver for January will contain the first of a series of articles giving the experiences of a lady journalist, Miss T. Sparrow, "as one of the penniless poor." This month's contribution deals with palm-workers, among whom Miss Sparrow lived and worked to secure the necessary information. The article is fully illustrated, as is an interview with the Countess of Meath upon the subject of the Ministering Children's League. Among other contributors to this number are the Bishop of Winchester, Prof. W. G. Blaikie, the organist of the Chapels Royal, the Rev. P. B. Power, and L. T. Meade.

THE Rev. Dr. Alexander Maclaren's sermons, revised by himself, will in future appear weekly in the Christian Commonwealth, beginning on January 3.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE Rev. C. J. Robinson, D.C.L., of Durham—late vicar of Horsham—has accepted the post of principal and professor of theology at Queen's College, London, vacant by the resignation of Canon Elwyn. Queen's College was founded in 1848, by F. D. Maurice, for the higher education of women; and its original staff included Plumptre, Charles Kingsley, Tom Taylor, Brewer, Sterndale Bennett, and John Hullah. Among the former principals have been Archbishop Trench and Dean Stanley.

Mr. F. MADAN has completed, for early publication at the Clarendon Press, a Bibliography of Printing and Publishing at Oxford, "1468"-1640. Full details are given of every book printed at Oxford from the introduction of the art to the year which has been chosen as the inferior limit; and it is clear that, in Mr. Madan's opinion, the much-disputed date on the colophon of the first Oxford-printed book should be 1478. The history of the early Oxford press, despite its long intermission in the sixteenth century, naturally illustrates in many ways the history of thought and opinion in England from the reign of Edward IV. to that of Charles I. The present bibliography possesses four features of novelty: the better representation of the title-page by the use of roman and italic capitals, as well as ordinary type; the mention of the chief type used in each book; the furnishing of the first words of certain pages to facilitate the identification of imperfect copies; and the insertion of actual pages of books printed at Oxford, selected from works which are cheap and common. In appendices, the author gives further particulars of the various productions of the fifteenth and early sixteenth century presses, together with a chronological list of persons and proceedings connected with book-production in Oxford, from 1180 to 1640. He likewise discusses the authorship of the Praise of Music (1586); prints in full the statutes and charters relating to the University Press; and adds lists of woodcut and metal ornaments, of imprints and tables of Oxford printers and publishers, from 1585 to 1640. The book will be illustrated with several facsimiles.

MR. W. H. R. RIVERS, of St. John's, has been recognised by the general board of studies at Cambridge, as a lecturer in moral science for a term of five years.

THE masters and fellows of Peterhouse, Cambridge, gave a dinner on Friday of last week, to celebrate the presentation to the college of the portrait of Prof. Dewar, painted by Mr. Orchardson, which was exhibited this year at the Royal Academy.

IT is notable how poor has been the competition at Cambridge recently for the minor academical prizes. The last number of the Cambridge University Reporter announces that the Hulsean prize is not adjudged, and also that no exercises have been sent in for the Yorke prize.

THE general meeting of the Modern Language Association was to be held on Friday of this week, at 4 p.m., at University College, Gower-street, under the presidency of Mr. H. Weston Eve. Addresses are promised by the Rev. Dr. W. Haig-Brown (the president-elect), Mr. George Saintsbury, Mr. Henry Bradley, and others.

WE have received No. XXXV. of the Proceedings of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society (London: Bell), containing communications made to the society during the academical year, 1892-3. A prominent feature of the number are the papers of Dr. M. R. James, dealing with mediæval art and MSS. Under the first head (1) he discusses the frescoes in Eton Chapel (discovered in 1847, and again covered up after drawings had been made of them), comparing them carefully with a similar series still visible on the walls of the Lady Chapel of Winchester Cathedral; and (2) he reconstructs the stained glass in the windows of St. Albans Abbey, by the help of a copy of Latin verses describing them which have been preserved in a MS. He remarks that we have in the series of names a sort of list of the Best Hundred Books, as they were conceived of in the middle of the fifteenth century; and he compares the existing glass in the libraries of Jesus College and Eton, and also the set of verse which decorated the library of St. Isidore of Seville. The MSS. which he describes are three in number: (1) a Psalter in the University Library (circa 1300 A.D.), containing illustrations similar to those in the Utrecht Psalter, and also a descriptive index to the illustrations of earlier origin; (2) a Greek Psalter in the Library of Emmanuel College (with a facsimile), which he believes to have been written in an English monastery in the twelfth century, and to show signs of having been studied as late as the fifteenth century; (3) a MS. of the New Testament in Latin in the Library of Pembroke College, which is known to have been presented to the Abbey of Bury St. Edmunds in the fourteenth century—the pictorial illustrations probably date from the latter part of the eleventh century, while the text was written late in the tenth. Another important article is that by Mr. W. H. St. John Hope, on the "Arms of the University and Colleges." The arms now borne by the University were granted by Clarendieu to Lord Burleigh as Chancellor in 1573, though there is some evidence that they existed at the date of the Council of Constance (1415). Somewhat later (1590), Clarendieu also granted arms to the five Regius Professors, which their successors are entitled to impale with their own personal arms, just as heads are entitled to impale those of their colleges. We are told that the mitre should be omitted from the Jesus arms, and that the ermine border of the modern Trinity Hall shield should not be engrafted. This paper, like some of the others, is excellently illustrated. In archaeology proper, we may mention an elaborate account of the Castle Hill at Cambridge, by Prof. Hughes, who concludes that there is no evidence of either British or Roman earthworks, though the site was undoubtedly occupied in those days; a Roman house excavated at Swaffham Prior in 1892, by Mr. T. D. Atkinson; a wooden bucket, with bronze fittings of Celtic workmanship, found in a well at Mountsorrel, Leicestershire, by Baron A. Von Hügel; and a collection of Graeco-Buddhist fragments, found in the Peshawur Valley, by Mr. H. Thomson—including a small figure of an orator, which bears a striking resemblance to the well-known statue of Demosthenes at Athens. We presume that this last collection is still in private hands.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

R. L. S.

HOME is the sailor, home from sea:
Her far-borne canvas furled,
The ship pours shining on the quay
The plunder of the world.

Home is the hunter from the hill:
Fast in the boundless enare
All flesh lies taken at his will
And every fowl of air.

'Tis evening on the moorland free,
The starlit wave is still:
Home is the sailor from the sea,
The hunter from the hill.

OBITUARY.

R. L. STEVENSON.

THIS time, we fear, the telegraph has brought a true message, that Stevenson is dead. The romance that formed a large portion of his life has attended him to its close. He has died in that far-off isle, somewhere amidst the still-vexed Southern Seas, to which so much of his later sympathies had been transferred. Death came to him suddenly at the last, and peacefully, with his wife and his mother about him. He has found lofty sepulture on a seaward-gazing mountain, whither he was borne on the shoulders of his faithful Samoans, and whence a memorial column will recall to sailors the lighthouses of his family: gaudet cognomine terra.

Robert Louis Balfour Stevenson—for such was his full name, though his friends knew him only as Louis—was born at Edinburgh in November, 1850, so that he had just completed his forty-fourth year. His father was Thomas Stevenson, secretary to the Commissioners of the Northern Lights, as his grandfather had been before; his mother was a Balfour. In his copious reminiscences of his youth we cannot call to mind any mention of brother or sister. Indeed, his upbringing seems to have been that of a solitary lad, nurtured upon books, local legends, and family traditions. He was educated at the Academy and University of his native city; and, when compelled to choose a profession, he qualified as an Advocate at the Scottish bar. But his heart was always in literature, and he was early drawn to London. The present writer remembers to have seen him first about 1873, when he had published nothing, but was already marked out for fame by critics who have since become famous themselves. He then looked much younger than his years, and not destined for a long life. The delicacy of his physique only heightened the charm of his appearance, while it certainly affected his manner of looking at things. As not unfrequently happens with genius, his whole life was a struggle against disease; but, unlike some others, he never allowed the shadow of death to dim the brightness of his nature. Courage and gaiety were as conspicuous in his talk as in his writing.

Twenty years ago the lot of a young author was not so happy a one as it is now. Reputations were made more slowly, and brought in smaller profits. Fortunate were they whose health permitted them to toil every night in the office of a daily newspaper. For the real journalism was a hard step-mother. There were few popular magazines, nor did syndicates in two hemispheres compete in advance for stories not yet written. All Stevenson's earliest work appeared in periodicals—some of it in the ACADEMY. He was one of the contributors to that brilliant but short-lived weekly, London, which contained more literature of the highest class than half-a-dozen of the reviews that are now so common. It was there that the New Arabian Nights first saw the light. He also wrote for the Cornhill, under Mr. Leslie Stephen.

The first book that Stevenson published was An Inland Voyage (1878), which was followed in the next year by Travels with a Donkey in the Cevennes. Both of these were warmly welcomed by the critics, though they failed to touch the great public. And yet they remain to this day the most perfect flower of his peculiar personality: humorous as Sterne without his sentimentalism, winning us by cultured allusions no less than by human sympathy, healthy as the broad earth and the open sky, finding natural expression in an original vein that always kept on the hither side of eccentricity. In these books, indeed, was seen—almost for the first time in English letters—a precision of language, a turn of sentences, a niceness of epithets, which rival the elaborate simplicity of the best French prose.

We must pass over Stevenson's other books, which now came out pretty frequently, until we are arrested by Treasure Island (1883), which first brought him reputation and money. He has himself told us how he came to write it: how the map was the starting-point, with reminiscences of Poe and Washington Irving; and how it had no great vogue when it first appeared in a boys' paper. Treasure Island marks a turning-point, not only in Stevenson's career, but also in the trend of English fiction. Thenceforth the current has set in favour of romance. Boys have always loved histories of adventure; but it seemed at that time that novelists were devoting themselves overmuch to the study of character and to psychological analysis. No doubt we shall always have both kinds with us. But the revival of the romantic in fiction—the return to Scott and Dumas and Kingsley—is mainly due to the example of Stevenson, whose genius transmuted the sordid record of a pirate's hoard into a monument of literary art.

Though the world has ever since agreed to call Stevenson a novelist, we venture to think it is not as a novelist that he excelled most. Prince Otto, which followed two years after Treasure Island, was a failure, though the author himself thought highly of it; nor does The Master of Ballantrae stand the test of a second reading. The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde belongs to a different category, that of the short story. Here, as in the volume entitled The Merry Men—which comprises work done at various dates—Stevenson's invention is to be seen at its finest. The bounds of the short story were to him what the bounds of the sonnet are to some poets. He could imagine a scene, a situation, a psychological moment, and reproduce it with a marvellous vividness that almost made visible the unseen. And while saying this, we do not forget the success which he attained in Kidnapped, and in its continuation Catriona. For those books may properly be considered as a chain of brilliant episodes, strung together on the personalities of two Scottish youths, in whom it is not difficult to recognise divergent strains in the mixed character which the author had himself inherited.

Whatever may be the present verdict on Stevenson's work, it is certain that it will live long enough to find the impartial judgment of posterity. Even during his lifetime he had become in some sort a classic. More than one of the younger men derive their inspiration from him, while his inspiration was all his own. But, apart from the question of originality in subject, none has succeeded in copying his inimitable style. This may be studied most profitably in his literary essays, though it is this also which sets the stamp of permanence upon his fiction. He was the most consum-mate artist in words of our generation; and withal a lovable man, and the loyalist of friends.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

In the Boletín of the Real Academia de la Historia for November, E. Saavedra gives an interesting account of the life and labours of Hernández y Sanahuja, one of the best of the archaeologists and local historians in whom Spain is so rich. He devoted his whole life to the illustrations of his native city, Tarragona, and to the preservation of its monuments. In another paper Prof. Hübner and Father Fita discuss the Roman remains of the same city. The professor invents a new name for a criminal: a mutilator of inscriptions is a "lapicide." F. Codera reports on the latest addition to the Bibliotheca Arabico-Hispanica, tomo ix.: "The Catalogue of Aben Jair." He confirms Señor Ribera's assertion that education among the early Arabs was free, and not a mere affair of state or of theology; the early Arabic translations of the Psalms and of the Bible were not made for the use of the Christian Muzarabes, but for literary purposes by learned Moors. Fernandez Duro gives an amusing instance of the necessity for controlling the hyperbolic enthusiasm of local patriotism, in his corrections of the proposed inscription for the statue of Oquendo at San Sebastian.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE NEW SYRIAC CODEX OF THE GOSPELS.

Oxford: Dec. 15, 1894.

If Philo had been called upon to formulate his creed, he would have done it in these or similar terms:

"I believe in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of all things visible and invisible,
"And in the Word of God, his only Son, begotten of him before all the ages, not made,
"Born of the ever-Virgin immaculate Sophia,
"Himself God,
"Light of Light,
"Life of Life,
"First-born of all creation,
"By whom also were all things made,
"The eternal image of God,
"The Spiritual Adam, who abideth with God from the first,
"The anointed of God,
"Our Mediator, who taketh our prayers and layeth them before the throne of God,
"Our Paraclete, who intercedeth for us. Our Saviour, King, and good Shepherd,
"For our salvation he came and still cometh down from heaven to earth, and is ever near at hand to them that call upon him, with whom he converseth as a friend with friends. In human form he manifested himself unto Moses, and unto Abraham with whom he sat at table and in appearance ate and drank,
"He putteth on human face and hands and feet and mouth and voice, and feeling of anger and of courage,
"He visiteth us, and hath, like a man, comings in and goings forth; and then he again ascends into heaven,
"He is our High Priest, free from all sins,
"He is the cup of God, the heavenly bread,
"He bringeth unto men the tidings of peace,
"His symbol is the desert-loving, heavenly dove,
"He is wroth with our sins, and will judge and punish us."

Want of space alone prevents my justifying from Philo's works every clause of the above formulary.

The Jews at the beginning of our era thus had the idea of a two-fold sensible manifestation to man of the Logos or Word of God: (1) as the Cosmos of Nature; (2) as our Helper and Saviour in human form. In his manifestation as the Cosmos, the Word, or pre-existent Son of God, is figured by Philo to be born of a virgin; and no doubt the feminine gender of wisdom, or Sophia, in Greek and Hebrew suggested this metaphorical way of envisaging to the imagination the ineffable process by which the Word is made sensible in the Cosmos. Hear Philo i. 361:

"He who made all things is fitly called demiurge and father of all that has become. But the mother thereof is Episteme, with whom, having intercourse, though not as a man, God begat (lit. 'sowed') his creation. But she, having received the seed of God, when her time was fully come, was in labour, and brought forth from her womb the only well-loved Son (of God)—namely, this our Kosmos. Wherefore by one of the Divine Choir, Wisdom is represented as saying about herself: 'God possessed me the very first of his works, and before the ages he established me' (Prov. viii. 22)."

This Wisdom is declared (i. 533) to be daughter of God, eternally a virgin, pure and immaculate. In the year of Rome 743 was born Jesus of Nazareth, a man in whom, because of his moral and thaumaturgic pre-eminence, his followers, so far as they were Aramaic-speaking Jews, quickly recognised their promised Messiah; while such of them as were Greek Jews and proselytes acclaimed in him the Divine Word, which, many times before in their history, had come down from heaven and assumed human form. As Jewish Messiah, restorer of the kingdom of David, Jesus had to be a Son of David according to the flesh; and accordingly as the natural son of Joseph, who was himself of the house and family of David, he is almost universally represented in the New Testament.

But, viewed as the Logos in human form, how should his birth be represented except as from a virgin? For, firstly, the very people who acclaimed in him the Word of God already regarded the Logos, at least in his parallel manifestation to sense as Nature, as born of Sophia, an "ever-virgin, gifted with an uncontaminated and unstainable nature." Secondly, these same people believed that many of their greatest men had been born of the Holy Spirit, when God visited from on high their mothers in their solitude. Thirdly, there was in that age a general belief that superhuman personages and great religious leaders were born of virgin mothers through Divine agency. So was Apollonius of Tyana; and Origen himself tells us (in Celsus 129) how Plato was said to have been born of Amphiktione, "her husband, Ariston, having been restrained from coming together with her (συνελθεῖν) until she should bring forth the child begotten by Apollo." In this and similar tales we make acquaintance with the intellectual atmosphere in the midst of which the Christian doctrine of the miraculous conception originated and grew up. Fourthly, in Philo we have not a few indications of how those who held the belief that Jesus was the incarnate Word would be likely to formulate the other belief which inevitably went therewith—namely, that he was born of a virgin.

Here are a few such indications: "Moses having taken his wife findeth her with child of nothing mortal (= of the Divine Spirit)." Compare Matt. i. 18, "Before they came together she (Mary) was found with child of the Holy Spirit."

"When the Lord saw that Leah was hated, he opened her womb, sowing into her noble actions. But the womb having received the virtue from God, yet brings not forth unto God. For He that is in need of naught, but unto me, Jacob, she bears sons. For it was for my sake, not his own, that God sowed. . . . Wherefore one that is not mentioned is found to be husband of Leah, while another is father of the children which issue from her; and he is father of the children, unto whom she is declared to bear them."

Compare Matt. i. 20 foll., "that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Spirit. And she shall bear thee a son . . . and she bore him a son and he called his name Jesus."

"Those to whose virtue the Law testifieth are not represented as knowing their wives, namely, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses."

Compare Matt. i. 25, "And Joseph knew her not until she bore him," &c. (I here assume that these words, though omitted in the Old Syriac and Latin Versions, are genuine.)

I believe that Philo's own idea of the marriage of virgin souls with God was wholly mystical and allegorical; and when he warns off (i. 146) the superstitious from the mystery he is propounding, he clearly refers to those who misinterpreted his allegory and degraded it into the gross and fleshly meaning which it has assumed in Matt. i. 19, where we read that Joseph was minded to put Mary away, as if the spiritual pregnancy wrought in the soul by God could possibly stand in the way of a human fatherhood, much less involve adultery.

Let us further test this explanation of the miraculous conception, but without confining ourselves to the Gospels. We have first the statement of Paul that Jesus was born of the seed of David according to the flesh, but ordained the Son of God in power according to the spirit of holiness. It is one more proof of how obtuse and carnally minded many of the earliest believers were, that they could degrade Paul's doctrine into the myth related in Matt. i. 19. However, if our theory that the mistake arose out of the confusion of a spiritual truth with material fact be true, we may expect to find in the Christian dogma marks of its origin and the stamp of the mint in which it was first coined. And so, we do. Plutarch, in his tract De Iside, trying to find a spiritual significance in the animal-worship of the Egyptians, says that the true reason why they worshipped the cat was this: that the cat conceives through her ears, and is therefore a symbol of the birth (γένεσις) of the Word, which also is conceived through the ears. If, then, the dogma of the miraculous conception be the misunderstanding of a metaphysical truth, which we suppose it to be, then we may expect to hear that the Virgin Mary conceived the Word through her ears. And it is so. "At the Annunciation," wrote one of the greatest of the Armenian Fathers, Nerses Claiensis, "the incomprehensible Word of God entered through the ears of the Virgin." We read the same in Ephrem the Syrian; and Origen's criticisms of the Pythian priestess (in Cels. vii. 4) imply in him the same belief, which is also depicted in early Eastern pictures of the Annunciation.

Let it not be objected that Plutarch was only thinking of the logos proforikos, of uttered speech; for I would ask of what else St. Ignatius was thinking when he wrote (ad Magnes. 8) of Jesus Christ the Son of God that "he is God's word proceeding out of silence" (λόγος ἀπὸ σιγῆς προελθών)?

In Philo again it is always the virginal soul which is impregnated by God. He commonly speaks of the "womb of the soul" in this connexion, and in the De Vita Contemplativa we have this typical passage:

"Most (of the female Therapeutae) are aged virgins, who have preserved their chastity not under constraint, like some of the Greek priestesses, but rather of free will; because of their zeal and longing for Wisdom (σοφίας); with whom anxious to spend their lives, they despised the pleasures of the body, filled with desire not of mortal offspring, but of the immortal, which the god-loving soul is alone able to bring forth of herself, when the father has sown into her those intelligible rays (ἀκτίνες νοητὰς) by which she will be able to contemplate the doctrines (δόγματα) of Wisdom (Sophia)."

Here are indicated two more aspects which, if my theory be true, we ought to be able to verify in the Christian apprehension of the miraculous conception. (a) The Soul should be the recipient of this peculiar form of the Divine grace. (b) The Seed or Spermatogenic Word of God ought to descend and enter the Virgin's ears as rays of light. To take this last point first. What says St. Ephrem (vol. iv., p. 17, of Armenian Version)?—

"The angel said to Mary: The seal of thy virginity is not broken, for the bright ray of gleaming light beams forth and dwells in thee" (ibid., p. 20). "Then went forth the command of the great King of all, and straightway the Son of the King entered by the portals of her ears."

"There beamed forth into Mary the effulgent ray of light, and she was not divided from the substance of the Father."

As to the first point (a) hear Rufinus on the Apostles' Creed:—

"The substance of God being wholly incorporeal, cannot be in the first instance introduced into or received by bodies, but there must be some mediating spiritual substance. . . . So the Son of God was born of the Virgin. He was not directly and primarily united with her flesh alone, but was generated of her soul, which was midway between flesh and God. Therefore, her soul came between and in the secret citadel of the rational spirit received the Word of God."

Lastly, when we read in Philo such passages as I have cited, and as the following (ii. 182)—

"The sinless Word of God bath for his parents Beings incorruptible and pure; to wit, God for his father, who is also father of the universe, and Sophia for his mother"—

we may expect to find (a) in primitive Christian writings and liturgies an express connexion of the virgin mother of Jesus with the Wisdom or Sophia of the Jews. And this we do; for (i.) in the Gospel according to the Hebrews—a very primitive writing—Jesus says: "My mother, the Holy Spirit, took me by a single hair of the head and lifted me on to Mount Tabor." The Holy Spirit was the same as Sophia.

(ii.) Valentinus, an early Gnostic, taught that "Sophia was the Spirit of God which came upon Mary, and that Jesus, the new man, was generated jointly from the Holy Spirit—which is Sophia—and from the Demiurge."

(iii.) On December 8, the feast of the B.V.M., the Roman Church appoints to be read Proverbs viii. 22 foll., that glorious description of Wisdom (Sophia), which begins with the very verse, "The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his ways," which spontaneously rose to Philo's lips when he had to tell of the generation from a virgin of the Divine Word.

(b.) We may expect to find that the mother of Christ was in Christian opinion eternally a virgin, and free from original sin. And this is exactly the dogma which the last Pope, Pío Nono, promulgated ex cathedra in 1856; so completing the cycle of dogmatic evolution which, years before Jesus of Nazareth was ever born, the Jewish theosophists of Alexandria had marked out for future Christian speculation to move through.

Two other causes contributed powerfully to the formation and spread of this dogma. Of these the one was the superstitious respect for virginity which characterised the earliest Christians, as it also held the minds of many of their Jewish contemporaries. They had the maxim, "That which God hath cleansed call not thou unclean." Yet they seem never to have seen that it sanctified the relations of the sexes in marriage; and so it was that they gave to the really saving doctrine of the incarnation of God in man an aspect under which it casts a slur upon our common humanity.

The other of these two causes was Docetism, or the opinion that the Word "made man" only assumed in appearance and had not, in reality, the features, habits, feelings, weaknesses of our humanity. In part this opinion was a mere survival of the Logos doctrine, as held by the Greek Jews in a pre-Christian age, who could not understand how the Word, which was God eternal and incorruptible, yet really became perishable and weak flesh. In part it was the direct outcome of the stress laid by Paul on the Resurrection, and of his rejection as carnal knowledge of those concrete details about Jesus of Nazareth, which interested Jesus' real companions. The result was, that the risen or apparitional Christ, uniting with the ὁψις θεωριέται ἢ κατ' ἀνθρώπων φύσιν of Philo, swamped and effaced in the minds of Gentile converts the historical Jesus. Nor was the figure of the Man of Nazareth brought home and made familiar to the average Christian outside Judaea until the Synoptic Gospels were diffused in the latter half of the second century. Of that diffusion a reaction in favour of the humanity of Christ, of which Arius was, a century after, the chief spokesman, was the direct outcome. Docetism, thus engendered, worked powerfully towards the adoption of the dogma of the miraculous conception. For a phantasmal Christ was most fittingly believed to have been conceived through the ears of a virgin by the impact on her soul of rays of light.

The more extreme depreciators of our despised humanity were not even content to deny a human father to Jesus, but denied a human mother as well, so retaining in full the old pre-Christian view of the ἐκδημιουργία or sojournings among men of the Logos. The Catholic Church, however, here as always, kept a media via, and retained the human mother as a concession at once to the human imagination and to the weaker sex.

And now I have outlined this chapter of Christian thought, leaving, of course, a thousand links to be filled in by anyone who will take the trouble; and I hope I have shown the necessity—if we would not relapse into a belated scholasticism—of orientating ourselves in the religious atmosphere of the first century; for the only sure way of purging our minds of errors and impossible beliefs is to get to understand how and why those erroneous beliefs arose.

F. C. CONYBEARE.

Edinburgh: Dec. 18, 1894.

With respect to the learned discussion of the new Syriac Gospel, I should like to be allowed to ask: (1) Whether it is not supposed to date only from about the ninth century A.D., and to be subsequent to the Monophysite controversy which convulsed the Eastern Churches? (2) Was it not a very ancient Gnostic belief that the human Jesus was distinct from the Divine Christ—a view which survives in distorted form in the legends of the Korān? (3) Is it not possible that a single writer, holding such a view, may have regarded the natural birth of Jesus as in no wise discordant with the virgin birth of the Divine Christ?

In the second century the Fathers appear to have been divided in opinion as to the Perpetual Virginity, and Clement of Alexandria seems to have regarded Christ as not human—a view surviving among Eastern sects, who do not celebrate Christmas Day.

Surely in a Syriac MS. we may expect peculiar views as to the nature of Christ at so late a period, and may also expect them in the second century, when opinion ranged from the purely human theory of Ebionites to the purely phantomist theory, which made Christ issue from the Virgin's side, as Buddha also was born.

C. R. CONDER.

Cambridge: Dec. 17, 1894.

I regret to find that I have made two mistakes in the Introduction to my translation of the Syriac Gospels. On p. xxvii. I ought to have said that in some (not the) Greek codices where vv. 9-20 of Mark xvi. do occur the word ταύς is found after v. 8. On p. xxx. I have said that the interpolation, "Woe unto us," &c., was already known to us from Codex Bezae; I should have said, "The Gospel of Peter." These two documents must have changed places in my memory, from the fact that Cambridge scholars have distinguished themselves in the study of both. I have also forgotten to include John viii. 1-11 in my list of omissions from the Textus Receptus, possibly because its absence is so obvious.

AGNES SMITH LEWIS.

ECCLESIASTES AND THE BOOK OF JOB.

London.

Prof. Cheyne remarks in his Job and Solomon (p. 83), "There is but one undoubted reference to Job in Ecclesiastes (v. 14 [15]; cp. Job i. 21)—we should perhaps have expected more." The opinion of a student of the Old Testament so indefatigable and so successful is undoubtedly entitled to respect. I venture to think, however, that there are other parallels between Job and Ecclesiastes, the evidence of which may appear on careful consideration not less cogent than that of those which Prof. Cheyne cites. With regard to the passages which I am about to adduce, it is important that due attention should be given to the great thought of Ecclesiastes, that the work of God among men—the busy work which rests neither by day nor night—is shrouded in impenetrable darkness, defying the scrutiny even of the wisest:—

"I saw as to all the work of God, that man cannot find out the work which is done under the sun, because that, though man should toil to seek it, yet will he not find it out; and even if the wise man should think to know it, he will not be able to find it out" (Eccl. viii. 17).

The same thought appears in Job, but associated to a greater extent than in Ecclesiastes with the mysterious phenomena of external nature. Such association does not, however, come out with prominence in connexion with Job xi. 7-9.

"Canst thou by searching find out God? canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? [It is] as high as heaven, what canst thou do? deeper than hell; what canst thou know? The measure thereof [is] longer than the earth, and broader than the sea" (A.V.).

Here there is a pretty obvious analogy with Eccl. vii. 23, 24.

"I said, I will be wise; but it was too far off for me. That which is far off and exceeding deep, who can find it out?"

Of greater importance for the student of Ecclesiastes is that very remarkable twenty-eighth chapter of Job. The difficulties which present themselves on account of the ascription of this chapter, and that preceding, to Job as speaker I need not now discuss. The twenty-eighth chapter begins abruptly, but its relation to the general subject of the Book is not very difficult to discern; and there can scarcely be a doubt that this portion of Job would be regarded with keen interest by the author of such a book as Ecclesiastes. God's work in the world is, with reference to its plan and intention, involved in impenetrable obscurity, resembling the depths of the earth, dark as the shadow of death. There is, however, an important difference. Beneath the obscurity which veils the divine procedure in the world none has ever penetrated. No searcher has succeeded in disclosing the matchless treasure which this obscurity conceals: a wisdom far more precious than the gold of Ophir, the onyx or the sapphire. But contrasting with this impotence and failure is the miner's signal success, not only in finding treasures amid the darkness, but also in bringing forth to light things hidden. He not merely discovers silver, but finds a way to bring it out (mošes, xxviii. 1); and gold and other metals are brought forth, and refined or melted, so as to become subservient to the uses of man. But "wisdom"—the divine transcendent wisdom—"whence shall it come? and where is the place of understanding? seeing that it is hidden from the eyes of all living."

It is very noteworthy that the last verse of the chapter (xxviii. 28) stands in marked contrast to what had gone before. Man had been virtually dissuaded from abortive attempts to discover the philosophy of the world, the transcendental wisdom. The problem is declared to be impracticable. Nevertheless there is "wisdom" and "understanding" (binah, Sept. ἐπιστήμη) for man, consisting in the fear of God and the avoidance of sin: "And unto man he said, Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding."

When Ecclesiastes was written Judaism had come into contact with Greek thought. But the discovery of the world-philosophy was as remote as ever. All speculation was "vanity of vanities." The dicta of the sages, as given in the discourse of Koheleth, furnished a warning against wearying the flesh by fruitless study and by making books without end (Eccl. xii. 12). Then follows the great general conclusion in a verse presenting a most remarkable parallel to Job xxviii. 28; a parallel which can scarcely be regarded as accidental, especially when what precedes in both Job and Ecclesiastes is taken into account. The Authorised Version translates, "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep His commandments; for this [is] the whole [duty] of man." Attention should be given particularly to the way in which "man" is spoken of in both passages.

In a recent number of the ACADEMY (April 7, 1894, p. 282), I said, "Probably the author of Ecclesiastes kept Job in view as he wrote." It will perhaps be admitted that this opinion derives increased probability from the evidence now adduced.

THOMAS TYLER.

Burleigh House, Sydenham Hill.

I wrote a long note upon Loover (or Louver) and Lodium in May, 1891. My practice when I write a note is to record in my copying-book when I send out the note, and to whom I send it; but in this case there is no record of any kind, and I have to trust to my memory only. I believe, however, that I sent the note to Notes and Queries; and that, when I found it was not inserted, I judged that the length of the note had been the chief objection, and contented myself with sending in again the second and shorter part of the note, which treated of the etymology of lodium only. My second attempt was successful, and this note will be found in Notes and Queries (7th S., xii. 163). It may seem strange to Mr. Mayhew, who has been able to suggest a common origin for lodium and loover, that I was able to write a separate article on lodium only; and I will, therefore, explain at once that I considered, and still consider, the two words to be of different origin, and to have come by degrees only to be related in meaning.

I began my note, like Mr. Mayhew, by endeavouring to show that loover (as I spelled it) could not come from the French l'ouvert. I pointed out, firstly, that, in the passage quoted by Prof. Skeat, the meaning of the words "murdrieries il a l'ouvert" are exceedingly obscure; and that, as Prof. Skeat had himself translated them in the two editions of his Dictionary in two altogether different manners, the first being absolutely grotesque, he was not entitled, from this passage at least, to conclude that the Fr. l'ouvert meant "the opening." I did not go so far as Mr. Mayhew, however, who says that there is no O.Fr. substantive ouvert—"opening," because I had found out that Godefroy gives one example in which the word has that meaning. We may compare the Fr. substantive couvert (still used), from which we have derived our covert, and perhaps also cover, in its sporting sense. And, again, if I insisted, like Mr. Mayhew, upon the presence of the t in the Fr. l'ouvert and the absence of it in the English word loover, it was not so much because I was of opinion that the Fr. l'ouvert could not lose its final t and become loover in English, though very likely Mr. Mayhew may be right (compare, however, the couvert and cover(t) just mentioned), but because I had chanced to find (which Mr. Mayhew does not seem to have done) the O.Fr. forms lover, luer, and lovier without a final t, in Godefroy, with much the same meaning as our loover, viz., lucarne—an opening or window in a roof (i.e., more or less our skylight), and then a more elaborate structure, answering more or less to our dormer-window.

I was influenced, moreover, by what I found in Grandgagnage ("Dict. Wallon"), who, though he gives two words which I consider to have the same origin as our loover, does not even hint at l'ouvert as having anything to do with them. These two words are leüverai and leuve; and on the first he says: "(petite lucarne). Peut-être un dérivé de l. *leu: cp. lang. loup (1. loup; 2. lucarne)." And at the end of his article he adds, "Nota. Cp. a.W. [i.e., ancien Wallon] leuve, t. de couverture, dont la signification précise m'est inconnue." Now among the Appendices to vol. ii., which were published by Scheler after Grandgagnage's death, there is (in the "Glossaire de l'ancien Wallon") an article on this word leuve by Grandgagnage himself, and in it he says: "Leuve, t. de couverture de toit . . . Prob. le prim. du n.W. [nouveau Wallon] leuverai (petite lucarne)." And he concludes with, "C'est prob. un ancien fém. de leu (loup)." On this article Scheler has the following note: "Selon moi, le n.W. leuverai est le dimin. de l'afr. luer luer (Lat. specular, Fr. lucarne), qui, à son tour, peut dériver d'un simple luve, love; quant à ce dernier, on peut le ramener à l'all. luke (lucarne, écouille); pour le v., cp. fr. douve de doga, afr. rover de rogare."

This derivation of Scheler's is, perhaps, possible, but I cannot say that I am in favour of it. It will be observed that he puts the u forms—luer, luve—before the o forms—love, lover—as if the u forms were the older; whereas Godefroy, having no etymology to consider, and so being less biassed, puts the o forms first, as if they were the older, and yet he borrows three out of his six quotations from Scheler himself. But if the u forms are the older, as Scheler thinks (and I doubt), would a German medial u become u in French? I doubt it very much; and, in addition to this, the change of a medial Germ. k into v in French must be very rare, if it exists. Scheler cannot give a single example, and can give only one in which a medial hard Germ. g may have become v in French. Scheler's doga (= Fr. douve) is Low Latin or Old Prov., not German; but Kluge (s.v. Daube) is of opinion that it may come from a M.H.G. or Dutch form, in which there is also a hard g.

As for myself, I much prefer Grandgagnage's suggestion that the Old Walloon leuve is the oldest form of the word extant (in the Walloon country), and that it is an Old Walloon feminine of leu = wolf. Grandgagnage throws out this suggestion very timidly, evidently because he was unable to see the connexion between a she-wolf (or a wolf) and an opening for light and smoke. And Scheler, with Grandgagnage's suggestion before his eyes, does not even mention it, so that he, too, failed to see the connexion. And this was the case with myself also for some months after I read Grandgagnage's article. But happening, one day at Fontainebleau, to look out of a window on to a roof with an open skylight, the connexion flashed across my mind in a second; for the angle made by the open skylight with the roof at once reminded me of the open mouth of a long-mouthed animal such as a wolf, while the comparative darkness of the inner extremity completed the resemblance to a wolf's open mouth with the gloom of his throat beyond it.

That this is no mere fancy of my own is shown by the modern Provençal words (see Mistral), loup (loub) = Fr. loup (wolf), and lucarne; loubéu, loubèt (which Mistral connects with loub) = petite lucarne; loubu (louvo) = Fr. louve (she-wolf) and lucarne. And lastly, and above all, by gorjo-de-loup (i.e., wolf's throat) = lucarne d'un toit.

My notion is, therefore, that the O.Fr. love (she-wolf) + had also, and for the reasons given above, the secondary meaning of lucarne,* which its Walloon equivalent leuve and its Provençal equivalent louvo had. In the first instance, probably simple uncovered openings (or skylights, if I may so call them, were used, partly for the admission of light, and still more for the emission of smoke; and gradually these openings may have had a cover of wood, or have been provided with slanting strips of wood, instead of glass. Each one of these openings or skylights was called a lore. But when, in the process of time, the banqueting halls became bigger, and larger openings were required, lanterns with four or more sides were made—unglazed, I believe, at first, but, no doubt, provided with sloping strips of wood (now called louvo-boards), so as to prevent the entrance of too much rain. For these more elaborate structures the word love no longer sufficed, and then it was that lover (or lovier) came into use. For the termination er (or ier) was frequently used to denote a place or a structure containing or composed of a number of the objects denoted by the primitive noun. Thus we have potager = kitchen-garden, from potage, formerly and strictly what is put in a pot, and so = vegetables, &c.; and casier, a set of pigeon-holes, from case, a pigeon-hole; and many other examples may be found in Diez's Grammar (3rd ed., 1871), ii. 353, 354.

This French word lover (lovier) became in English lover, loover, lower, louvre, and we even find lovery (Webster), which is curiously like the Walloon leuverai quoted above. And, singularly enough, according to the first note written on the subject in Notes and Queries (viz., 6th S., vi. 86), the simple word love, in this or a similar sense, still exists in Yarmouth. It was, indeed, regarded as a corruption by those who heard an old man use it of the racks on which herrings are hung when on their way to becoming bloaters; but now, after what I have said, it seems likely that the old man made no other mistake than that of sticking to a word which had come down to him from his forefathers. Compare Mr. Way's note to the word lover in his edition of the Prompt. Parv., which concludes as follows: "In the Craven district a chimney is still called the love or lurver." Mr. Atkinson, however, does not give either word in his "Glossary of the Cleveland District." If love really does still exist in England = lover (or loover), this seems to me quite fatal to the l'ouvert theory, for lover would surely never be corrupted into love. But my theory it suits exactly, for, according to this, love preceded lover.

With regard to lodium, I must refer Mr. Mayhew to my note in Notes and Queries, which I have quoted above. I consider it to be a form of lobium (the transitional steps are given in my note), which = the O.H.G. lobud, laubjd (N.H.G. Laube), from which also the Ital. loggia and the Fr. loge have been derived. Diefenbach gives lodium = "vleimsche vinstere" (Flemish window), which is the more remarkable as I have had much to do with Walloon words in this note. It looks as if these loovers originated, or first became remarkable, in the country now called Belgium.

F. CHANCE.

Dorney Wood, Burnham, Bucks.

Mr. Mayhew is certainly right in regarding with suspicion the commonly received derivation of "loover" from French l'ouvert. There can be no doubt as to the immediate origin of the English word. I have as little hesitation in referring it to O.F. lovier (of the existence of which Mr. Mayhew does not seem to be aware) as Prof. Skeat has in referring it to French l'ouvert (see his note in Glossarial Index to "Piers the Plowman," C. Pass. xxi. 288, referred to by Mr. Mayhew).

No satisfactory evidence, so far as I am aware, has been adduced in support of the equation (either as regards sense or form) F. l'ouvert = Eng. "loover." Of the equation (so far as sense is concerned) M. Lat. lodium = Eng. "loover" examples abound. Mr. Mayhew mentions several in his letter. To prove the identity of Eng. "loover" with O.F. lovier, we require instances of the equation M. Lat. lodium = O.F. lovier. Of these I can supply several. One such occurs in an extract from a thirteenth century Latin-French Glossary in the Hunterian collection at Glasgow, printed by M. Paul Meyer in Part I (p. 125) of his Report on French MSS. preserved in Great Britain (1871). One of the rubrics in this Glossary is "Hec sunt partes domus principales"; then follows "Particule ejus sunt," under which heading we find about half-way down the list—

"Hic imbrex..... } lover."
"Hoc lodium..... }"

Other instances may be found in Godefroy, s.v. lovier. The identity of Eng. "loover" with O.F. lovier, then, may be regarded as satisfactorily established.

There yet remains the question of the etymology of the French word. Mr. Mayhew suggests that the origin of "loover" may be found in a derivative of M. Lat. lodium. This suggestion had already been made with regard to the O.F. word by Dr. A. Bos, in his Glossaire de la Langue d'Oïl (1891). Under lovier, he says "Étymologie douteuse. Serait-ce lo(di)varium de lodium?" Mr. Mayhew suggests an Anglo-Norman loirc = M. Lat. lodarium, and would explain the presence of the v in the Eng. word as an intercalation "taking the place of a vanished dental" on the analogy of "O.F. pouvoir." But I think it will be found that the v in pouvoir is no older than the fifteenth century; whereas the v already existed in O.F. lovier and Eng. "lover," at any rate, as early as the thirteenth century, at which time pouvoir, Mod.F. pouvoir, was represented by the form pooir. But, whatever the correct hypothetical intermediate forms between M. Lat. lodium and Eng. "loover" may be, the suggestion that the two words are connected etymologically is a plausible one. Let us hope that satisfactory evidence on the point may some day turn up.

In Wright's Volume of Vocabularies (p. 203) a "loover" is explained as "the open tunet, or lantern, on the roof of a building, especially on the old baronial halls, the original object of which was to carry off the smoke from the fire in the middle of the hall." A good example is figured in Parker's Glossary of Architecture, vol. i., p. 231 (ed. 1845), where the suggestion is thrown out that the Paris Louvre owes its name to a lantern of this kind. This, however, appears to be unfounded (see Du Cange, s.v. Lupara).

An amusing mediaeval etymology of the word lodium is given in the Dictionarius of John de Garlande (printed by Wright in his Volume of Vocabularies, p. 137): "Lodia, dicitur a lucem do, quia per lodium intrat lux domum."

PAGET TOYNBEE.

Barnf, Aylth, N.E.

This word has not disappeared from our language, nor is it merely provincial. "Luffer-boarding," less correctly "Lever-boarding," is an architectural term, defined in Gwilt's Encyclopædia of Architecture as "inclined boarding with intervals between the boards, nailed in an inclined direction on the sides of buildings or lanterns, so as to admit a free current of air and at the same time exclude the rain." The derivation is also given as being simply the French louvre. This word, however, is not given in that sense by Littré or Godefroy, yet I seem to be well acquainted with the term; and, if I mistake not, Mr. Ruskin speaks of "louvre-boards" in connexion with belfries.

* He treats of the word leu in three different articles, and 1. Leu has the meaning of "wolf."

I confess I was surprised, in looking into Littré, to find that he considers the origin and meaning of the word Louvre as applied to the royal palace in Paris (the only sense in which he gives the word) as unknown. I always supposed that the palace had taken its name from some conspicuous lantern or structure of a similar character connected with the original building.

J. H. RAMSAY.

P.S.—For the word "louvre" my attention is called to Parker's Glossary (p. 222): "Lantern . . . a term sometimes applied to louvres on the roofs of halls," &c.

GREEK ETHICS.

Brown University, Providence, B.I.: Dec. 4, 1894.

In his notice of my Study of Ethical Principles (ACADEMY, November 24), Mr. Benn raises several important questions as to the Greek interpretation of virtue.

(1) In opposition to my statement that "for both Plato and Aristotle the ideal life was a life of speculation or intellectual contemplation, in which no place was found for practical activity or the play of the ordinary sensibilities," Mr. Benn submits that both philosophers find room for the latter form of life in their description of the moral ideal. I did not intend to imply that either Plato or Aristotle had no plan for the ordinary practical life, and I have elsewhere in my book fully recognised the truth for which Mr. Benn finds it necessary to contend. But I still hold that the ideal life is for both these philosophers a life withdrawn from the sphere of ordinary sensibility and practical activity—a life of pure thought or philosophic contemplation. The ordinary or unphilosophic life, though recognised and vindicated by both, is regarded as one of only secondary excellence. Plato's estimate of their relative worth is illustrated by his companion pictures of the philosopher and the lawyer, in the Theætetus, while Aristotle's distinction between "intellectual" and "moral" virtue implies the same appreciation.

(2) Mr. Benn convicts me of another "gross misrepresentation" of the Greek philosophers, in saying that "the classical world had no idea of a non-political society," and adduces Stoicism as evidence to the contrary. But is it not a fact that Stoicism is a phenomenon of the post-classical period; that it is largely a Semitic product, and that in it, as Zeller says, "the standpoint of the Greek world is abandoned"?

(3) I had, of course, no intention of reading the doctrine of Immortality in its modern form into the "most reluctant" Aristotle. Here, as elsewhere, I have given myself a considerable license in "using" Greek philosophic thought, and that just because I was anxious to make the most of the Greek contribution to Ethics, rather than, as my critic supposes, to minimise or disparage it. I believe that, in many things, we must go "back to Aristotle"; but this does not mean that we must forget all that we have learned since Aristotle.

JAMES SETH.

A NEW INTERPRETATION OF A LINE IN "HAMLET."

Dublin: Dec. 1, 1894.

The following interpretation of a well-known and much-debated line in "Hamlet" may interest some of your readers. So far as I am aware, it has never been chanced upon before.

When Hamlet replies to the king's question, "How is it that the clouds still hang on you?" with "Not so, my lord, I am too much i' the sun," it would seem to me that the reply simply means that Hamlet had been weeping, and "with veiled lids" had been trying to conceal his tears. Upon this having been noticed he says, "I am too much i' the sun," which is equivalent to "The sun is shining upon my face, and I must needs turn away my eyes."

The reasonableness of this conjecture is further borne out by the queen's admonition, "Do, not for ever, with thy veiled lids, seek for thy noble father in the dust"; and by a subsequent speech of Hamlet, where he says, "No, nor the fruitful river in the eye, nor the dejected haviour of the visage . . ."

SCIENCE.

Progress in Language. With Special Reference to English. By Otto Jespersen. (Sonnenschein.)

SINCE his appointment to the chair of English in the University of Copenhagen, Prof. Jespersen has not allowed his official duties to interfere with his literary activity. From purely phonetic studies, in which he took a leading position, he has rapidly passed through what may be called a comprehensive course of Early English, in his Danish Life and Poems of Chaucer, to the treatment of some special features of Modern English in his Study of the English Case-System, also in Danish. In an appreciative notice of the last-mentioned treatise in the ACADEMY of January 2, 1892, a hope was expressed that the gifted author would fulfil his promise to deal with the whole subject in a larger way, and "in some language more widely known than Danish."

The present work will be gratefully accepted as a partial instalment of the debt incurred to a public who, when they discover writers of this calibre, are apt to become greedy, and with Oliver Twist to ask for more. It is written in English, and, it may be added, in almost faultless English. At least a diligent hunt for slips has failed to discover more than one, or at most two, that for what (line 1, p. 140), and, at end of p. 159, manners, which, as a plural in the sense of ways, sounds odd. The work also deals in a much broader way with some of the interesting topics touched upon in previous publications. In fact, it boldly attacks some of the fundamental problems of linguistics, not only with rare ability, but with the freedom and originality that one expects from a sound philologist who claims kinship with such leaders of thought in this branch of knowledge as Rask, Madvig, Verner, and Thomsen. In the preface it is described as to a certain extent a translation of the Case-System, with additions and suppressions, which "make it in some respects an entirely new work." Hence the new title, the meaning of which is not perhaps at first sight quite clear, but which explains itself in the light of such remarks as "many phenomena . . . are really, when viewed in their historical connexion, conducive to progress in language" (p. 278), and "in course of time we witness a gradual development towards greater regularity and precision" (316). Progress, therefore, here means not merely change, but change for the better—improvement—and this is the key-note of the book. The author reasons, and reasons with singular acumen, against a very commonly accepted opinion, that change in language is somehow often different from change in the biological series, a change for the worse, and not a continuous readjustment to the changing environment. The mind improves, and its instrument, speech, decays! Mankind has made some considerable intellectual advance, say, since the time of the Twelve Caesars; but the English language, because of its simplicity, loss of inflections and analytical forms, is not to be compared with the highly synthetic Latin of Vergil or Tacitus! Well, a great part of the work is devoted to a thorough exposure of this fallacy; and the immense superiority of English over the earlier languages, on the very ground of the change from synthesis to analysis, is established beyond doubt—indeed, reduced to a simple algebraic formula, proved, so to say, by mathematical demonstration. Here the advantage of a somewhat severe word-order, which is shown to be correlated to fleecional loss, thus acquiring functional force and dispensing with corresponding superfluous grammatical expedients, is excellently argued from a distinctly original standpoint.

"Cannot this [time-saving process] be compared with the ingenious Arabic system of numeration, in which 234 means something entirely different from 324 or 423 or 432, and the ideas of 'tens' and 'hundreds' are elegantly suggested by the order of the characters, not ponderously expressed as in the Roman system?"

Put in this way the significance of such sentences as John beats Henry, Henry beats John, becomes manifest; and all are ready to endorse the dictum, "The substitution of word-order for flexions means a victory of spiritual over material agencies" (p. 111).

But Dr. Jespersen claims our gratitude even on more solid ground for his successful onslaught on what may be called the "Teutonic fetish," still blindly worshipped by so many philologists. No one who understands the subject will ever grudge the Germans full credit for the splendid work they have accomplished in this field. But they have failed to evolve an acceptable theory of speech as a whole, or even to explain many of the structural phenomena of the most specialised forms of speech, partly because their attention has been too much confined to those very higher forms (mainly the Aryan and Semitic families, with a "stepmotherly" glance at Uralo-Altaic, and other "lower forms"), partly because they have never succeeded in shaking off the shackles of the Hegelian philosophy in which the past generations have been nurtured. Our author is free from both of these superstitions: he has learned to seek for light in Bantu among the "lower forms," and he openly rebels against the tyranny of the great name of Schleicher, whom he denounces as

"from the outset a sworn adherent of Hegel's philosophy; this is a fact well worth remembering, for not even the Darwinian sympathies and views of which he was a champion towards the end of his career made him alter the doctrines of his youth" (p. 4).

That is so; and, as Schleicher mainly carried German thought with him, many generalisations have been based on a priori or deductive reasoning, which, if tested by the inductive method, would never have been accepted by any sane mortal. Take the monstrous dualism, which divides the growth of language into two stages—the prehistoric, which is constructive; and the historic, which, to put it briefly, is destructive—hence a swarm of Hegelian inferences and mystifications, by which the Teutonic intellect is still warped. It would be interesting to know how many living German philologists, even of the Brugmann stamp, have yet got rid of the monosyllabic root theory, by which the Indo-Chinese group is taken as typical of the starting-point, instead of being the result of profound phonetic decay, and, consequently, typical of the most advanced stage in the evolution of speech. This Dr. Jespersen sees, though perhaps somewhat dimly; and he is evidently unaware of the fact that this important truth has been firmly established by the late regretted Terrien de Lacouperie. The present writer acquired his knowledge of the subject from the great Sinologist's own lips, and he was able to proclaim a doctrine destined to revolutionise linguistic science so far back as the year 1882 (Asia, of the Stanford series, first ed., p. 700).

All are familiar with the hopeless failures of German philology to explain the extraordinary features of grammatical gender in the Aryan or Semitic groups, to which it is assumed to be exclusively confined. Here, again, Dr. Jespersen knows better, and is able to throw some light on the subject by reference to the Zulu-Kafir (Bantu) prefix alliterative system, "which is much like Arian gender" (p. 57). But here also he is unaware that he has been anticipated by the present writer, who was the first to point out the analogy many years ago in the ninth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, articles "Kaffraria" and "Zululand." It was further shown in his Ethnology of Egyptian Sudan (1884, p. 9) that the Tibu language supplied "the raw material out of which gender has been elaborated in the Hamitic languages." As the original kinship of Hamitic to the Semitic group is now recognised, it follows that the clue is here afforded to the explanation of grammatical gender as developed both in the Aryan and the Semitic systems.

In his attempt to solve the problem of the origin of articulate speech, the author seems less successful. But his speculations on these more abstruse questions, however interesting and even instructive in themselves, could scarcely lead to any satisfactory results. They are vitiated by a fundamental misconception, which is readily explained as a natural reaction from the old theory, "which imagined the pre-historic development of Arian speech from roots through agglutination," and which theory is of course held to be untenable. But the reaction is, as usual, too violent, and for roots are substituted intricate polysyllables of inordinate length. Thus, we have the curious spectacle of a return to the polysynthetic theory as the starting-point at the very time when American philologists (Hewitt, Dorsey, American Anthropologist, October, 1893) are running full tilt against Duponceau's views regarding the general polysyllabism of the Indian languages. Working from the present condition of Aryan speech backwards to the oldest known forms, Dr. Jespersen finds nothing but a high state of synthesis; and he therefore infers that at a still earlier period it must

"in many points have presented similar features to those found in Basque, or in those entangled polysynthetic Indian languages, where the sentences consist in intricate words, or word-conglomerations, embodying in one inseparable whole such distinctions as subject, verb, direct and indirect objects, &c." (p. 123).

And elsewhere:

"At a still earlier stage we must suppose a language, in which a verbal form might indicate, not only six things like cantavisset, but a still larger number, in which verbs were perhaps modified according to the gender (or sex) of the subject, as they are in Semitic languages, or according to the object, as they are in some American Indian languages" (p. 347).

But, seeing the inconsistency of taking synthesis as the ultimate residuum, he admits that those rejecting the root theory "will have to look out for a better or less ambiguous word for the condition of primitive speech" (ib.), and thus seems to arrive with Sayce at an impasse. It was impossible from Dr. Jespersen's standpoint that it could be otherwise; but by attacking the problem from a different and more logical standpoint, that of organic evolution, which begins at the beginning, and not at the end, and which with Herbert Spencer works forward from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous, the better word may be—has been—found.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE ANDAMAN ISLANDERS.

High Elms: Dec. 17, 1891.

Major Temple has written you a long letter of which he has not done me the honour of sending me a copy, but which appears in the ACADEMY of last week, in which he accuses me of "fictions" and "wild statements," with reference to the Andaman Islanders, all of which he states might have been avoided if I had followed Mr. Man's account published in the Journal of the Anthropological Institute. He refers to my Prehistoric Times, and proceeds to give nine illustrations, with reference to which you will, I doubt not, allow me the privilege of defending myself. Some of the points are trifling, but I refer to them, lest it should be supposed that I am missing anything of importance.

I.

The first accusation is that I spoke of the Andaman Islanders as "Mincopies." Now Mr. Man, in the very memoir to which my severe critic refers, himself says "Almost all accounts which have been written regarding these Islanders speak of them as Mincopies." Naturally, therefore, I adopted the term.

II.

In this case the difference is whether the Mincopies live "chiefly" on fruit, or "occasionally" on fruit. As to this the authorities differ, but the difference is very unimportant.

III.

I say that "outriggers appear to have been of recent introduction," while Major Temple considers that "the outrigger canoe is the oldest form." This categorical statement is improbable in itself, and inconsistent with the account given by Dr. Monatt and the other earlier observers.

IV.

Major Temple contradicts my statement that the Andaman Islanders tipped their arrows with glass obtained from wrecks, and that they are good bowmen. My authority for the statement was Sir E. Belcher. Moreover, it must be remembered that my book was written thirty years ago, and it may well be that the bow is not so much used now as formerly. Does Major Temple doubt that English soldiers were once good bowmen?

V.

This refers to the question whether they had pottery. No doubt they do now make earthen pots; but I hardly think the earlier observers can have overlooked the existence of pottery, and Major Temple admits that even now they do not use it for holding water.

VI.

I said "they kill fish by harpooning, or with small hand nets." Mr. Temple contradicts this, and says "they only kill dugongs, turtle, and such fish as sharks, &c., with harpoons." . . . "Only the women use hand nets." Where, then, was I wrong? Are not "sharks, &c." fish?

VII.

I said "they cover themselves with mud and also tattoo." Major Temple says "they are not always covered with mud," but I did not say they were; and "the Ongé tribe never tattoo themselves"; but he does not deny that most of the tribes did.

VIII.

I said "they are stated to have no idea of a Supreme Being." Major Temple asserts, on the authority of Mr. Man, that "they do believe in a Supreme Being." This is a most important point; it will be observed that I made the remark cautiously, and on the authority of the earlier observers. Mr. Man wrote much later, when the natives may well have imbibed new ideas from more civilised sources. But, after all, what does Mr. Man tell us? "They believe," he says, "in a spirit named Puluga," who "lives in a stone house," "spends much of his time in sleep," "growls when he is angry," "has no authority over evil spirits," and "did not create them," "and is much vexed at seeing a pig badly quartered and carved." This is not my idea of a Supreme Being. Moreover, in another passage, Mr. Man tells us that, "as they have no idea of invoking the aid or blessing of a Supreme Being, nothing of a religious character attaches itself to the marriage ceremony," and again, "they had no form of worship, nor any word of prayer"; but he significantly adds that, "since seeing the Mohammedans at their daily devotions, and learning that they are addressing an invisible Being, "they have compounded a name for it." A people who "have no idea of invoking the aid or blessing of a Supreme Being" cannot be said to believe in one.

IX.

Major Temple contradicts my statement as regards the marriage customs, for which, however, I quote my authorities—namely, Sir E. Belcher and Lieutenant St. John. He should therefore attack them and not me.

I submit, then, that I had ample authority for what I said; that on most of the points I am actually supported by Mr. Man; and that on those points in reference to which he differs from other authorities, it is more than likely that the statements of earlier observers correctly represented the condition and ideas of the natives before they came in contact with European and Mohammedan influences.

In fact, Major Temple has not detected a single mistake in what I said; and I confidently appeal to your readers whether he was justified in describing my account of the Andaman Islanders as "scientific fiction" and "a series of errors."

JOHN LUBBOCK.

SCIENCE NOTES.

It is announced that a paper by Lord Rayleigh and Prof. Ramsay on "A Newly Discovered Gas" will be taken as the subject for discussion at a meeting of the Royal Society on January 31, which will be the first meeting under a resolution of the council, passed last session, whereby certain meetings—not more than four in each session—are to be devoted to the hearing and consideration of some one important communication.

THE organising committee—of which Major L. Darwin is chairman, and Mr. J. Scott Keltie and Dr. H. R. Mill are secretaries—has issued an invitation circular for the Sixth International Geographical Congress, which is to be held in London next summer, from July 26 to August 3. Definite arrangements have been already made for the treatment of certain selected subjects of special importance. For example, General J. T. Walker has undertaken to read a paper on "Geodesy in Relation to the Survey of India"; Prof. Elisée Reclus, on "The Construction of Globes"; Admiral A. H. Markham, on "Exploration in the Arctic Regions"; Baron Nordenskiöld, on "The History of Early Charts and Sailing Directions"; Sir John Kirk, on "The Development of Tropical Africa under the Superintendence of the White Races"; and Prof. E. Levasseur, on "Geography in the School and University." In each case the reading of the paper will be followed by a discussion. There is also to be an exhibition, in connexion with the Congress, of such objects as instruments, maps, globes, reliefs, and models, photographs and pictures, equipment for travellers, historical mementoes, and publications.

"The many students and teachers of scientific subjects who were disappointed that the weekly journal Science never satisfied the need for a critical scientific newspaper, will be glad to know that arrangements have been completed to begin a new series of Science on January 1, under wholly different direction and auspices. The paper will be under the control of a representative editorial committee, and will undertake to report on the progress of science for men of science. The managing committee is constituted as follows: mathematics, Prof. Simon Newcomb (Johns Hopkins); mechanics, Prof. R. S. Woodward (Columbia College); astronomy, Prof. Pickering (Harvard); chemistry, Prof. Remsen (Johns Hopkins); physiography, Prof. W. M. Davis (Harvard); palaeontology, Prof. O. O. Marsh (Yale); morphology, Prof. W. K. Brooks (Johns Hopkins); zoology, Dr. C. Hart Merriam (Washington); botany, Prof. N. L. Britton (Columbia); hygiene, Dr. J. S. Billings (Washington); physiology, Dr. H. P. Bowditch (Harvard); ethnology, Dr. J. W. Powell (Washington); anthropology, Dr. D. G. Brinton (Pennsylvania); psychology, Prof. Cattell (Columbia).

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE Académie des Inscriptions has elected Prof. A. Weber and Dr. W. L. Big as foreign associates, to fill the two places vacant by the deaths of Sir Henry Layard and Commendatore G. B. de Rossi.

MESSRS. LUZAC & Co., of Great Russell Street, have been appointed official agents for the Asiatic Society of Bengal, as from the beginning of the new year.

WE must notice together the two last numbers of the Indian Antiquary (Kegan Paul & Co.):—

FOR August, Dr. G. A. Grierson begins an edition, with translation, of the Bhastrabushana of Jaswant Singh. This is a popular Hindi treatise on rhetoric, written about a hundred years ago, which Dr. Grierson maintains to be specially valuable as showing the long, unbroken current of classical Sanskrit tradition. We quote his summary of its contents:

"The work is divided into five lectures. The first is merely introductory [containing an invocation of Ganesha]. The second deals with heroes and heroines [with an extraordinary minuteness of classification]. The third deals with the various essentials of a poem—the flavours, the emotions, and the various modes of their expression, the essential and enhancing excitants, their accessories and ensuants. Then follows the fourth lecture, the main body of the work, in which the various rhetorical ornaments of sense (the simile, the metaphor, and so forth) are defined and illustrated. The fifth lecture deals with verbal ornaments (alliteration and the like)."

The same number also contains a long account of demonolatri in Sikhim Lamaism, by Dr. Waddell, describing the personal and house demons, the country and local gods, the demons of earth and sky, directions for exorcism, and an enumeration of the ceremonies attending death and burial.

FOR September, Prof. G. Bühler contributes two important articles. One of these is the conclusion of a former paper, entitled "The Roots of the Dhatupatha not found in Literature." This is a protest against the view of Whitney, that those verbs, &c., collected by Pazini, which are not to be found in our existing Sanskrit texts, are therefore fictitious. Prof. Bühler maintains, on the contrary, that every root or verb in the Dhatupatha which has a representative in one of the Prakrits or in one of the modern vernaculars must be considered as genuine and as an integral part of the Indo-Aryan speech. And he makes an appeal for the co-operative compilation of an exhaustive Dictionary of Indo-Aryan roots, based upon a critical examination of all known texts, published or unpublished, Sanskrit, Prakrit, or vernacular. In his other paper, Prof. Bühler discusses a subject which has lately attracted much attention—namely, the age of the Veda, as determined upon astronomical grounds by Prof. Jacobi and Prof. Tilak. It happens that he was made acquainted with the view of both these scholars before publication, and is, therefore, able to testify to their independence of each other. While accepting their general theory, Prof. Bühler draws from it some new inferences of great importance. If it be suggested that the original astronomical system of India was derived from one of the ancient Semitic or Turanian nations, yet it is certain that a modification of the original system, which can be proved to date from not later than 2000 B.C., is an independent Indian invention. Prof. Bühler goes on to show how this early date for the Vedic literature agrees with the results of recent philological research, and particularly with the facts implied in the early and complete conquest of the South by Brahmanical Aryans. Finally, he called for a renewed examination of all the astronomical and meteorological statements in Vedic works, and their arrangement in handy and intelligible tables. To the same number Dr. Grierson contributes an obituary notice of Prof. Whitney, and also a study of the hemp plant in Sanskrit and Hindi literature. As a sacred plant hemp appears very early; but its use as an intoxicant cannot apparently be traced back further than the tenth century A.D.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

ASIATIC.—(Monday, Dec. 11.)

SIR RAYMOND WEST in the chair.—Dr. Th. Block read a paper on "An Unpublished Valabhi Copper-plate Inscription of King Dhruvasena I." The inscription is in Sanskrit, is written in prose, and is one of the oldest Valabhi inscriptions that have yet been discovered, being dated 207 of the Gupta Samvat era = A.D. 536-7. The purport of the inscription is to record a grant made by the king to the congregation of monks residing in the Vittrāra founded by the king's sister Duddā, and to another founded by the venerable teacher Buddhādāsa. The grant consisted of a village named Vasaprajyaka (?). Of the two monasteries the first is well-known; but the second has not yet been found in any inscription hitherto discovered. The chief interest connected with this new copper-plate is, that it confirms the historical account we already possess that the Valabhi kings, although themselves devout worshippers of Śiva, were yet protectors and patrons of the Buddhists who lived in their country; while it also shows the wide spread of Buddhism at that period and the religious toleration accorded to it.

METEOROLOGICAL.—(Wednesday, Dec. 19.)

R. INWARDS, Esq., president, in the chair.—Mr H. Southall read a paper on "Floods in the West Midlands," in which he gave an interesting account of the great floods which have occurred in the rivers Severn, Wye, Usk, and Avon. He has collected a valuable record of the floods on the Wye at Ross, which he arranges in three classes, namely—(1) primary or highest of all, those of 14 feet 6 inches and above; (2) secondary, those with a height of 12 to 14½ feet; and (3) tertiary, those with a height of 10 to 12 feet. The dates of the floods above 14 feet 6 inches are as follows: 1770, November 16 and 18; 1795, February 11 and 12; 1809, January 27; 1824, November 24; 1831, February 10; 1852, February 8 and November 12. The height of the recent flood on November 15, 1894, was 14 ft. 3 ins., which was higher than any flood since November, 1852. The flood on the Avon at Bath on November 15, 1894, is believed to have been the highest on record.—Mr. R. H. Scott gave an account of the proceedings of the International Meteorological Committee at Upsala in August last, with special reference to their recommendations on the classification of clouds and the issue of a Cloud Atlas.—A paper by Mr. S. C. Knott was also read, giving the results of meteorological observations made at Mojaung, Madagascar, during 1892 to 1894.

FINE ART.

John Russell, R.A. By George C. Williamson. With an Introduction of Lord Ronald Gower. (Bell.)

IF John Russell, the once celebrated portrait painter in crayons, the favourite of George III. and the Royal Family, has been somewhat neglected since his death, he has for a great part of that time shared his obscurity with some other and better painters—with Raeburn, for instance, and Romney, and Joseph Wright, of Derby. It is with Wright that he had most affinity: a sober, industrious, serious artist, with more insight than imagination, a painter of the middle-class principally, not a little provincial, leaving for the most part the splendours and graces of high society to more fashionable pencils. It is probable that the revival of Russell's reputation would have taken place some years earlier, but for the material in which he preferred to work; and it might have been delayed much longer, but for the revival of this material itself by the modern pastellists. The new pastels are indeed very different from the "coloured crayons" which Russell made so carefully with his own hands; and his pictures, with their florid colouring and unpleasant surface, conceal rather than display the true merit of the artist: so that if the renewed interest in his art has been caused partly by the old-fashioned method he employed, it will only be sustained because he possessed some gifts as a portrait-painter which are altogether independent of material. He had sincerity, simplicity, and a faculty not only for reproducing the outward aspect, but for revealing the inward disposition of his sitters. Though he did not flatter them, he did not miss what of beauty or grace they possessed; and he seldom failed to make them interesting, however poorly endowed with physical attractions.

These, his true gifts, are perhaps better seen in the illustrations to this book than in the highly coloured originals. Though unequal in merit, and possessing the defects of all "processes," they suffice to make us well acquainted with the man and the artist, and to raise him to a level among English portraitists, which, if it falls short of the highest, is yet above the zone of mediocrity. His portraits of the Banks family are in themselves sufficient to prove this. We have Sir Joseph himself, his wife (Dorothea Hugessen), his mother, and his handsome, eccentric sister, Sophia. All of them are admirably characterised and full of life. They have style also, and refinement without affectation. As we turn over the pages we come across a new and pleasant acquaintance on almost every leaf. Now it is pretty Mrs. Russell herself and the baby; now the delightful group of Mrs. Milward and her four step-children; now one of his many religious friends, earnest and thoughtful, like the Rev. H. G. Watkins; or a handsome young man like Capt. William Harvey, of Rolls Court, Essex. Some of the portraits are remarkable for their strength of character, like Mrs. Hey, of Leeds, with her fine eyes, and old Mrs. Redsdale, of the same city, helping herself to a pinch of snuff. Charming also are some of the children, like his two little boys, William and Thomas, bending their heads over a drawing, and the three children of Lady Exeter (the dairymaid countess) with "Burleigh House by Stamford Town" in the distance. Altogether the range of human sympathy is considerable, and there is little conventionality except in his fancy pictures, which are happily scarce. The most disappointing portraits are not the new acquaintances, but the old ones, like Sheridan and Cowper. It is somewhat difficult, despite the positive testimony of Dr. Williamson, to accept the latter; and the Sheridan is very tame.

But the interest of the book is not entirely artistic. We learn, what no one would have suspected from his art, that Russell was an Evangelical of the most pronounced type in the days of religious revival under Whitfield, Wesley, and Lady Huntingdon. In his youth his ardour knew no bounds. He preached and argued in season and out of season; he engaged all his sitters in Christian conversation, and endeavoured to paint and convert them at the same time. The title-page of his diary is inscribed with the date of his own conversion, which took place September 30, 1764, "at about half an hour after seven in the evening"; and the diary itself consists largely of records of his own spiritual experiences. He quarrelled with his father, and with his master, Francis Cotes; he caused a riot at Guildford; and he so stirred the neighbourhood near Cowdray, where he was the guest of Lord Montague, that he was refused accommodation at all the inns of Midhurst. He had the same difficulty with the Fadens, print and map sellers at Charing Cross; but he succeeded in converting and marrying one of the family, who bore him twelve children. It is a testimony to the fine qualities of Russell's nature that, in spite of the violence and persistency of his evangelical efforts, they do not seem to have lost him many friends. It is probable that his ardour cooled as he grew older, or, rather, that his better sense prevailed. We do not hear of his attempting to convert the Prince Regent, with whom he was on excellent terms; and he painted not only the Princess of Wales and Princess Charlotte, but Mrs. Fitzherbert and Mrs. Jordan. But his sincerity in religion as well as in art is not to be questioned; and though he was morbidly sensitive and eccentric in many ways, he was evidently a genuine and manly character, of whom any family might be proud.

As I have said, no one would suspect from his art that his religious convictions were narrow and violent. If there is nothing wanton in it, there is nothing prudish or puritanical. He had evidently a strong sense of female charm, and even in his portraits of noted Christian "professors" no attempt is made to invest them with "sanctity." If his religion kept his art pure, he did not allow it to overstep its province; and he had the sense to refuse to abandon the exercise of his special gift in order to devote himself to preaching, although strongly urged thereto by Lady Huntingdon. The strength of his faith was beautifully illustrated on his deathbed, when he refused to pray with his son William, afterwards Rector of Shepperton. "No, William," he said, "do not pray for me; there is no prayer for me, henceforth it is all praise."

Russell had religion as his stay, art as his profession, and he had also astronomy for a hobby. It is characteristic that he should be devoted to this hobby, and that it should be a distinct and limited one. He confined his investigations to the moon; and during a period of twenty years, with the aid of his daughters, he drew careful maps of its visible surface, and he invented an apparatus, called the Selenographia, for exhibiting its phenomena. His great map of the moon and one of his machines are now in the Observatory at Oxford.

Although the book is not marked by literary ability, Dr. Williamson has spared no pains to make it complete and worthy of its subject, and has been judicious in his extracts from the diaries and other abundant material at his disposal. The appendices, with lists of pictures, exhibited, sold, existing and missing, show also much patience and zeal. It may be hoped that some of those which have disappeared may ultimately be recovered; but unfortunately "coloured crayons," though permanent enough when kept from the damp and dirt, are easily damaged beyond reparation. When the book is revised, it would be well to include an alphabetical list of the pictures instead of ranging them under the name of the owners, and also to correct a few slips. It was, for instance, Hervey, not Harvey, who was the author of the "Meditations," and Mr. Merry, not his wife, who wrote under the name of "Della Crusca."

COSMO MONKHOUSE.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS are about to publish Lorenzo Lotto, an essay in constructive criticism, by Mr. Bernhard Berenson, being the first of a series of special studies, in which the author hopes to follow up the views about Venetian painting, generally indicated in his little book on "The Venetian Painters of The Renaissance." In this volume Mr. Berenson, feeling himself obliged to reconstruct the history of Venetian art in the latter half of the fifteenth century, makes a detailed study of Lotto, based upon an analysis of all his existing works, and on documents which have just come to light. It contains thirty plates, many of which have been photographed for the first time expressly for this work.

A PICTURE of "Dawn," by Mr. A. J. Warne-Browne, illustrating St. Matthew xiv. 22-33, has been added to the collection of the Gallery of Sacred Art, in New Bond-street, which already includes works by the late Edwin Long, Mr. F. Goodall, Cavaliere Ciseri, and Mr. Herbert Schmalz.

MR. JAMES GLAISHER, chairman of the executive committee of the Palestine Exploration Fund, writes as follows:—

"Letters have been received from Dr. Bliss and Herr von Schick, stating that the iron-bound door of Neby Daüd, which had remained open against the wall for a number of years, having been recently blown down during a severe storm, there was disclosed on one of the stones behind it an inscription which seems not to have been before noticed. It is in Latin, and according to Dr. Bliss's report, is a votive tablet to Jupiter on behalf of the welfare and greatness of the Emperor Trajan and the Roman people, erected by the Third Legion, which takes us back to the interval between the destruction by Titus and the founding of Aelia Capitolina. It was partly covered with plaster, and may have been entirely covered when the door was last opened and shut, which may account for its being unnoticed. It is built into the modern wall about 15 feet above the ground. Roman inscriptions are very rare in Jerusalem, and this discovery is, therefore, of exceptional interest. A squeeze of the inscription is expected to arrive shortly. Up to the date of his last despatches Dr. Bliss was still tracing the line of the old wall, which he had followed for over a thousand feet."

We quote the following from the Times :

"The United States Minister in Constantinople, reporting recently to the Department of State on the exploration of the ruins of Niffer, near ancient Babylon, mentions that the work is undertaken at the cost of an association in Philadelphia, which was formed in 1888, and is called the Babylonian Exploration Fund. Some 200 Arabs are constantly employed, under the direction of Dr. Peters, of the University of Philadelphia; and the Minister says that, 'in the number of tablets, brick, inscribed vases, and in the value of cuneiform texts found, this American enterprise rivals, if it does not excel, the explorations of Layard at Nineveh and Rassam's excavations at Abu Habba.' Dr. Hilprich, also of the University of Pennsylvania, who was originally connected with the exploration, remains in Constantinople at the request of the Turkish Government, to translate the inscriptions and arrange the tablets and other objects excavated. Many tens of these, including tablets, vases, inscribed bricks, and sarcophagi, have arrived at the Constantinople Museum, and the Sultan has promised that Pennsylvania shall receive one of all duplicate antiquities. So far, 20,000 tablets of clay and stone have been discovered, on which are inscribed promises to pay, deeds, contracts, and other records of public and private events. 'About 150 Hebrew, Mandic, Arabic, and Syrian inscribed bowls have been dug up. These are more than all the museums in the world possessed before. They have also found hundreds of Babylonian seal cylinders . . . about 1000 vases of alabaster, marble, and other stone have been discovered, with votive offerings of lapis lazuli, magnesite, and agate. Many hundred vases, toys, weapons, instruments, and household objects in iron, bronze, and clay were discovered.' The temple of Bêl is being dug out; and the Minister says that, when finished, it will be the first temple of Bêl ever systematically excavated. The excavation was carried down 42ft. below the foundation of the immense temple."

We have to record the death of Sir Oswald Walters Brierly, marine painter in ordinary to the Queen, which took place on December 14. Sir Oswald had attained the age of seventy-seven years, and for some time past had been incapacitated from work, though two or three sketches of his are to be seen at the present exhibition of the Royal Water-Colour Society. In his early days he travelled widely, having been at one time a shipmate of Prof. Huxley on board the surveying ship Rattlesnake in the Pacific. He was also privileged to witness the naval operations of the Crimean War, in both the Baltic and the Black Sea; and to accompany the Duke of Edinburgh in his voyage round the world in the Galatea. He excelled in painting historical battle-pieces, many of which have been engraved—two of them for the Art Union. One of these pictures was "The Loss of the Revenge," which was first exhibited in 1877, just before Tennyson's poem on the same subject appeared. Sir Oswald Brierly also held the office of curator of the Painted Hall, Greenwich.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

A NEW Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, by Mr. Emanuel Moor, was performed at the London Symphony Concert last Thursday week at the Queen's Hall. The opening Allegro is a skilfully constructed movement, and full of life and vigour; but there is a certain lack of homogeneity about the music. The Andante is smooth and graceful, and, on first hearing, strikes us as the best of the three sections. In the Finale the thematic material is characteristic, and there are some good contrasts. The part for the solo instrument throughout the Concerto is very prominent, and evidently not easy to play. The composer's rendering of it was most energetic. Mr. Heuschel gave a dignified reading of Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, though perhaps he did not display the full strength of the opening Allegro: the Andante was interpreted with special feeling and charm. The programme opened with Dr. Mackenzie's "Britannia" Overture. Saint-Saëns' "Danse Macabre" is undoubtedly clever; but surely it is not the proper province of music to depict dancing skeletons and the rattling of bones. The work was, however, brilliantly performed. Mme. Medora Henson gave a powerful rendering of Elisabeth's Greeting from "Tannhäuser."

Mr. Plunket Greene and Mr. Leonard Borwick gave their second Song and Pianoforte Recital at St. James's Hall on Friday, December 14. The programme was interesting. Mr. Plunket Greene sang some quaint German songs of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and others by Brahms, Cornelius, and Dr. Stanford; also some of the songs of the English counties arranged by Lucy Broadwood and J. A. Fuller-Maitland. Mr. Greene, who is an accomplished artist, deserves great credit for selecting songs by no means hackneyed: vocalists as a rule keep in one groove. Mr. Borwick's numerous solos were played in most finished style. We were glad to hear a Mozart Sonata. Pianists are now so fond of Chopin, Liszt, and modern music generally, that many excellent works by Mozart, Haydn, and other classical masters, are unduly neglected. Clementi may have written many dry sonatas, but there are some well worthy of revival. It is more than thirty years since one of them was performed at the Popular Concerts.

Berlioz's dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," was given on Saturday at the Crystal Palace; many years have passed since it was last heard in London. The choral portions of the work are the least interesting; the instrumental music, however, represents Berlioz at his best. The plaintive "Romeo" movement is fine, but the two great numbers are the "Love Scene" and the "Queen Mab" Scherzo. The former won the admiration of Wagner, not prone to praise the music of his contemporaries, while the latter is remarkable for its imagination and for the rare skill in orchestration which it exhibits. The Symphony is also of historical interest. Berlioz was not the inventor of representative themes; but the characteristic use which he makes of the "love" motive in this Symphony cannot fail to have impressed Wagner, who at the time of its production was practically unknown. The performance at the Palace, under Mr. Manns's direction, was unequal. The instrumental music, especially the "Mab" Scherzo, was finely rendered, but the chorus was far from good. Miss Dews was the contralto, Mr. E. Wareham the tenor, and Mr. Norman Salmond the bass. The last-named artist did not give an impressive reading of the Friar's music. The whole of the programme, by the way, was devoted to French composers—Berlioz, Gounod, Massenet, and Méhul.

Mr. Emil Sauer has completed his series of eight pianoforte recitals. At the last one, on Monday, he played Beethoven's Sonata in F sharp (Op. 78), an interesting work, though, as compared with some of the other Sonatas, of minor importance. The pianist's reading was sound and sympathetic; the rapid Scarlatti-like passages of the second movement were given in a remarkably clear, crisp manner. Mr. Sauer disappointed us in his interpretation of Chopin's Barcarole, also in that of Liszt's "Erlkönig" transcription. But he was suffering from a severe cold with fever, and claimed the indulgence of the audience; it would, therefore, be ungracious to criticise. But we may venture to find fault with the version of Schubert's Impromptu (Op. 90, No. 3), which he used. Mr. Sauer has introduced many transcriptions into his programmes; and this is to be regretted, seeing that the literature of the pianoforte is extremely rich, and there are many excellent Sonatas and other works which are totally neglected by pianists. But to announce an Impromptu by Schubert, and to give a modern arrangement of it, is inexcusable. Mr. Sauer has justly attracted a good deal of notice: he is a remarkable pianist, especially in the matter of technique. Yet it is not in the greatest works—we refer particularly to Beethoven's Op. 53 and Op. 57—that he has given the greatest satisfaction.

It is curious to note the manner in which Rubinstein's death has been commemorated in London. At the Crystal Palace only a portion of the programme on November 24 was devoted to his music. Last week, the evening of Gompertz's chamber concert, the Royal College of Music gave in Rubinstein's memory, not one of his own Symphonies, but Tchaikowsky's in B minor (No. 6); the performance by the students, we understand, was one of high merit. On Tuesday the Royal Academy of Music also offered a tribute in the shape of the D minor Concerto, of which Miss Edith O. Greenhill gave a vigorous and intelligent rendering. Surely one or two of Rubinstein's exquisite songs might also have been included in the programme. At the latter concert Goring Thomas's Cantata, "The Swan and the Skylark," was given for the first time in London, under the direction of Dr. Mackenzie. The music has much delicacy and charm, but it is grateful rather than great.

Last Thursday evening Berlioz's "Faust" was given at the Albert Hall, under the direction of Mr. Randegger, and with success. Sir Joseph Barnby, who was unable to occupy his accustomed place at the conductor's desk, is one of our most active musicians, and everyone will sympathise with him in his forced cessation from work, and welcome him back when his health is restored. J. S. SHEDLOCK.

Tales from Scott.

By Sir

EDWARD SULLIVAN, Bart. With an Introduction by EDWARD DOWDEN, LL.D., Professor of English Literature at the University of Dublin.
An Attempt to do for Sir Walter Scott what Charles Lamb did for Shakespeare.

"It is as an incentive to the perusal of the novels themselves that the work is most to be commended, and it is so well done on the whole that we doubt if there can be any young reader who, having never yet perused the Waverley Novels, will not be led to them by the reading of these condensed versions."—Morning Post.

"The work could hardly have been better done than it is by Sir Edward Sullivan. The stories are told with much felicity of style and diction. The narrative flows easily and distinctly, and the incidents are clearly followed."—Aberdeen Free Press.

In fcap. 8vo, tastefully printed, and bound in olive cloth, uniform with "Obiters Dicta," price 5s.

Essays About Men, Women, and Books.

By AUGUSTINE BIRRELL, Q.C., M.P.

"Mr. Birrell's light and easy style well belits his generally kindly judgments. A very entertaining and handy little book for leisurely reading."—Times.

"Mr. Birrell is always good company. He is always himself, and the self is so sane, so shrewd, so vivacious, that this fidelity to it suffices to make his books delightful."—Daily Chronicle.

"Very aptly and facile are the judgments which he passes on the men and women included in this volume."—Daily Telegraph.

"These essays have a charming individuality of manner, not self-conscious and affected, but spontaneous. It is when discoursing of bookish matters that Mr. Birrell is at his best."—Globe.

The Humour and Pathos of Anglo-Indian Life.

Extracts from his Brother's Note-book. Made by Dr. TICKLEMORE. Edited by J. E. MAYER, M.D.

"After all that has been told us by Mr. Kipling, India has still its unknown regions and its inner ring of mystery. In this book many interesting side-lights are cast on the life of our fellow-countrymen in out-of-the-way Indian districts. Some of the stories would serve excellently as the skeletons of three-volume novels. Even the most astonishing have an unmistakable stamp of veracity."—British Weekly.

“CADBURY’S”

A COCOA

Of the highest degree of Purity & Nutritive Value

Every drinker of Cocoa should bear in mind the following important facts:

Cadbury’s is absolutely pure, therefore best. The “Medical Annual” says, the name ‘Cadbury’ on any packet of Cocoa is a guarantee of purity.

Cadbury’s is entirely free from objectionable alkalies, giving a false appearance of strength, by producing a dark colour.

Cadbury’s being genuine Cocoa, does not thicken in the cup. It is a refined beverage—light, digestible, and nutritious.

Cadbury’s is economical—a small spoonful makes a large breakfast cup of delicious, refreshing Cocoa, of the greatest strength and the finest flavour.

Cadbury’s is equally suitable for the robust, the young, and the aged, and particularly those of weak and impaired digestion.

Cadbury’s is the most stimulating and sustaining, and is made instantly with boiling water or milk.

“CADBURY’S”

“The typical Cocoa of English Manufacture—Absolutely Pure.”

Studies in Prose and Poetry. By Algernon Charles Swinburne. (Chatto & Windus.)

MR. SWINBURNE'S new volume of essays is as typical of him as any of the previous prose volumes of criticism which have proceeded from his pen. It has the same breadth of sympathy and appreciation—within certain limits—the same moments of piercing insight, the same power of occasionally putting into one trenchant phrase the essence of a book or a poem; but, unhappily, it has also the old defects both of literary style and of violence and extravagance in judgment. The praise and blame are almost always in the superlative degree. The good are all very very good, and the bad are all horrid. They do not approach each other by gradations. They are thrust into two classes, one of them to be overwhelmed by obloquy, the other to be praised so extravagantly that we lose sight of any dividing line between the lesser and the greater masterpiece, while the nicer points of criticism tend to disappear altogether in tempestuous eulogy or scorn. Mr. Swinburne, in fact, has not the temperament of the critic in the sense that Matthew Arnold had. There is not the same coolness of judgment or the same balance of expression. He divides the world of literature broadly into the sheep and the goats; and when he is not hurling anathemas at the goats, singly and collectively, he is respectfully patting the sheep. The warmth of his appreciation, it is true, is sometimes infectious; and the weight of his invective, when it is directed against work which we agree with him in detesting, is grateful and comforting; but even in the moments of our most cordial agreement we cannot help asking ourselves whether this is criticism. In a vast number of cases, in fact, it is not. Mr. Swinburne is a poet, not a critic. He has the vehemence of sympathy, the violence of repulsion, which belong to the poetic temperament. He has not the sobriety, either of style or judgment, which makes criticism weighty. Perhaps that is why, when we read his prose, we are led instinctively to study it rather in the light it throws upon the writer than in the light it throws upon his subject. When we read these essays on Victor Hugo we feel all the while that we are learning more of Mr. Swinburne than of Hugo. We are tracing the writer's moods, studying the bent of his sympathies, and making deductions therefrom, which shall help us in appreciating and interpreting Mr. Swinburne's own verse, and the changes which his attitude towards life would seem to have undergone during the thirty years of his career. There are phrases and turns of expression in these Studies which irresistibly recall that first essay of the author's in literary criticism, or, at least, literary polemic, Notes on Poems and Reviews. All students of contemporary literature will remember this pamphlet, which appeared in 1866, at the time when a Homeric struggle was raging over the body of Poems and Ballads (first series). Mr. Swinburne's contribution to that struggle was this "reply" to his critics. In it the curious will find as it were the archetype of Mr. Swinburne's criticism. The style is the same—loaded with ornament, antithesis, epithet. The spirit is the same. Here are all the familiar excesses of diction, the tempest of praise, the torrent of imprecation, the piling of Pelion on Ossa, whether in the way of applause or disapproval. The very playfulness which for a moment may peep out has in it a concentrated scorn more deep than curses. And in both we find the same moments of illumination and insight; the same caustic touches, which, by their truth and lucidity, lighten up a whole page of somewhat turgid encomium or execration.

Most, if not all, of the essays in this volume have already appeared in various periodicals, many so recently as to be still remembered by even the most casual reader of Mr. Swinburne's work. Even when they appeared one by one and at considerable intervals, these defects of his style were noticeable; but it is when they are collected into a volume like the present that their disadvantages are most conspicuous. Mr. Swinburne's prose is like one of Mr. Beardsley's pictures, without any half tones or degrees of light and shade, masses of dead black side by side with spaces of pure white. We are blown from one to the other by the tempests of the author's sympathies, with no intermediate twilights to soften the contrast. Let us take one or two examples. Here is one on page 89:

"Do you suppose it is as easy to write a song as to write an epic?" said Béranger to Lucien Bonaparte. Nor would it be as easy for a most magnanimous mouse of a Calibanic poeticule to write a ballad, a roundel, or a virelai, after the noble fashion of Chaucer, as to gabble at any length like a thing most brutish in the blank and blatant jargon of epic or idyllic stultiloquence."

One quite agrees with Mr. Swinburne that the crowd of inferior verse writers, who fail so droarily in the art of writing epic or idyllic verse, would fail at least as signally if the time devoted to their twelve books of blank verse were given to the composition of a dozen roundels or villanelles. But the statement loses rather than gains in force by calling the writers "magnanimous mice of Calibanic poeticules," and their works "the blank and blatant jargon," &c.

Again, on page 90 we find:

"Sixth on the list of selected poems is a copy of verses attributed to Shakspero—of all men on earth!—by the infamous pirate, liar and thief who published a worthless little volume of stolen and mutilated poetry, patched up and padded out with dirty and dreary doggerel, under the senseless and preposterous title of The Passionate Pilgrim."

This is the language, not of criticism, but of Billingsgate; and, however just the author's view may be, diminishes rather than increases the weight of his opinion by the intemperate violence of its expression. The truth is that Mr. Swinburne, in the vehemence of his sympathies, misuses language shockingly, and by his free employment of invective in comparatively trivial matters, leaves himself really no adequate words to employ when he wishes to speak of things of higher importance. To speak of a telegraph post as an "incomparably disgusting object" is absurd, even when the post is unfortunately placed from an artistic point of view. A telegraph post is not "disgusting" if language is to have any precision at all, and it is not "incomparably" anything. Both epithet and adverb might be reserved for a greater occasion and a larger theme. But this piling up of epithet alike for purposes of eulogy and of contempt is the besetting sin of Mr. Swinburne's prose, and it is the same lack of restraint and moderation which makes him double all his adjectives, and heap up antitheses till his sentences become turgid and unwieldy. In fact, it is scarcely too much to say that if every second adjective in this volume were excised the style would gain in force. Let us take a sentence—almost any one will do—and examine it in this fashion.

"If the accusation of monotony or the charge of repetition brought against the greatest of lyric poets by the lazy malignity of envious dulness is as false and fatuous as it is common and easy, the same charge or accusation when brought against the most careful and conscientious of their commentators and exponents is inevitably more difficult to meet and to refute."

This really means that if the charge of monotony brought by envious dullards (according to Mr. Swinburne) against Victor Hugo is as false as it is easy, the same charge against his conscientious commentators is more difficult to refute. But why "accusation or charge," "false and fatuous," "common and easy," "charge or accusation," "careful and conscientious," "commentators and exponents," "meet and refute." It is not as if Mr. Swinburne used language with such exactitude that every one of these words had its special force in the above sentence. On the contrary, they are all used vaguely and indefinitely. They obscure, instead of illustrating, the author's meaning. And it is curious to note that this defect of style is not present, or at least not conspicuously present, in his French prose. One of the essays included in this volume, that on "The Cenci," is written in French of admirable lucidity, and with a restraint which the English essays so frequently lack. We all know that Mr. Swinburne is one of those men who seem born masters of more languages than many men learn in a lifetime, that he can write Greek, Latin, and French verse with equal facility and success; but that his French prose should be actually better than his English is certainly remarkable.

But it may perhaps be urged that this ungrateful part of the reviewer's task, the pointing out of a radical defect of a poet's prose style, is unnecessary. Mr. Swinburne does not claim to be a stylist: what has to be considered is his judgment on literary questions, not the language in which it is conveyed. But unhappily his style and his judgment are so far one that both are marred by the same defect. There are, however, passages which are exceptions to this. The first essay of all, that on Sir Walter Scott's Journal, is, on the whole, very happy in its appreciation of a noble character. "Thank heaven," said somebody once, "we know nothing about Shakespeare." "Thank heaven," says Mr. Swinburne, "we know all about Scott. But this knowledge brings him so near to us that we feel it almost as difficult as his nearest friends must evidently have felt it to express the impression or translate the emotion it produces."

The "Recollections of Professor Jowett" (which appeared only a short time ago in one of the monthlies) is a less satisfactory piece of work. Indeed, there are passages in it which might well have been moderated, if not altogether excised; but it contains one acute criticism of the man which is too happily expressed to be readily forgotten.

"No man, I suppose, can enjoy the dignity and exercise the authority of a 'master' over boys at school or youths at college, without catching some occasional infection of autocratic infirmity; without contracting some dictatorial or domineering habit of mind or tone of manner which affects his natural bearing and impairs his natural influence. Even of the excellent husband of Jeannie Deans it is recorded that 'the man was mortal, and had been a schoolmaster.'"

The remark is admirably felicitous. Of Herrick, Mr. Swinburne writes with enthusiasm, but he admits "his general monotony of matter and of manner" as damaging to his fame. Two essays, on Webster and on Beaumont and Fletcher—of whom Mr. Swinburne writes with an appreciation which certainly does not err on the side of defect—are followed by one on "Social Verse," which displays the range of his knowledge of poetry to great advantage, while it also gives him an opportunity for onslaughts upon C. S. Calverley—"a jester, graduate or undergraduate, fit enough to hop, skip, and tumble before university audiences," and upon "a bad poet named Clough, whom his friends found it useless to puff," which some of his readers will not agree with. The essay on Wilkie Collins is one of the best in the book; while that in which he rends Walt Whitman, though at times somewhat ferocious in tone, is really not unjust. Those who have read the earlier essays will instinctively make allowances for the exaggeration of its style. Here is his summing up of the qualities of Whitman:

"A just enthusiasm, a genuine passion of patriotic and imaginative sympathy, a sincere though limited and distorted love of nature, an eager and earnest faith in freedom and in loyalty—in the loyalty that can only be born of liberty; a really manful and a nobly rational tone of mind with regard to the crowning questions of duty and of death: these excellent qualities of emotion and reflection find, here and there, a not inadequate expression in a style of rhetoric not always flatulent or inharmonious. Originality of matter or of manner, of structure or of thought, it would be equally difficult for any reader not endowed with a quite exceptional gift of ignorance or of hebetude to discover in any part of Mr. Whitman's political or ethical or physical or proverbial philosophy. . . . In other words, he generally means well, having a good stock on hand of honest emotion; he sometimes sees well, having a natural sensibility to such aspects of nature as appeal to an eye rather quick than penetrating; he seldom writes well, being cabined, cribbed, confined, bound in, to the limits of a thoroughly unnatural, imitative, histrionic, and affected style."

The general verdict is severe but just: that Whitman, with a little more sense and a good deal more cultivation, might have made a noticeable orator, while no amount of self-culture could ever have made him a poet. The short skit on the Bacon-Shakespeare controversy, "Tennyson or Darwin?" is not particularly amusing. Mr. Swinburne's hand is always a little heavy when he is playful.

The last half of the book is devoted to a series of essays on the posthumous works of Victor Hugo. With Mr. Swinburne's adoring worship for the great Romanticist we are all familiar. It permeates all his work and has left a lasting mark on his verse. But captious people may question whether, even with a man so undeniably great as Hugo, adoring worship is an attitude altogether compatible with sound criticism. But these studies are none the less interesting that they throw more light, perhaps, on Mr. Swinburne than they do upon the great French poet. There are delicious gleams of personal political feeling in them which, while they do not go far to illustrate Hugo, help us sensibly in forming our conception of Hugo's English disciple:

But they contain, none the less, some acute pieces of criticism:

"The materialism of Dante's invention, however quaint and even gross it may seem to modern thinkers, is utterly at one with itself throughout: the materialism of Hugo's is so self-contradictory, so inconsistent in its accumulation of incompatible impossibilities, that we cannot even imagine a momentary and fantastical acceptance of it. . . ."

This is written of "La Fin de Satan." In the course of these Studies he has contrived to give us, by a clever selection of examples, an insight into Hugo's thought in its most varied phases. And for this alone, quite apart from their critical estimate of the poet, they provide interesting reading. Take, for instance, the following note of Hugo's on a conversation he had had with a young murderer under sentence of death:

"Everything fades away in sight of death except affectation. Good-nature vanishes, malevolence departs, the kindly man becomes bitter, the rough man becomes gentle, the affected man remains affected. Strange that death should touch you and not make you simple!"

The thought is new, almost audacious, but full of insight. And then the delicious epigram on the poplar, "Le peuplier est, comme l'alexandrin, un des formes classiques de l'ennui." It is not just, at least to English eyes, but it embodies a mood so admirably. And the extraordinary concentration of pessimism in this:

"Homme, mon frère, nous sommes Deux hommes,
Et, pleins de venins,
Deux nains.

"Ton désir secret concerte
Ma perte,
Et mon noir souhait
Te hait;

"Car ce globe où la mer tremble
Nous semble,
Pour notre appétit
Petit.

"Nous manquons, sur sa surface,
De place
Pour notre néant
Géant.

Altogether "interesting" is perhaps the word that best describes Mr. Swinburne's new volume of prose. Its criticism is not always just, and its style is generally intemperate; but it is valuable as throwing an additional light upon the temperament of a man who has influenced the educated thought of the latter half of this century more deeply than any contemporary poet.

ST. JOHN E. C. HANKIN.

Napoleon and the Fair Sex. Translated from the French of Frédéric Masson. (Heinemann.)

I AM far from saying that this book is worthless, for every part of the life of Napoleon, and everything that throws light on his character, is of value to the student of history; and if it is true that this extraordinary man, like Louis XIV. and William III., did not permit female favourites to direct his conduct, it is also true that his wonderful fortunes were powerfully affected and even shaped by women. How would it have been, for example, in the world's destinies had Josephine borne Napoleon a son, and had he not, in marrying Marie Louise, trodden on flowers that concealed the abyss of ruin? His relations, therefore, with women deserve attention; and, besides, they illustrate parts of his nature to be kept in light in a survey of it—the passionate ardour of his Southern blood, his lavish generosity, and the innate kindness of a disposition of intense human sympathies. This work, accordingly, Napoleon and the Fair Sex—I adopt the title of the English translation—is not without a certain kind of use. M. Masson certainly has proved himself to be an indefatigable and far-reaching explorer. Yet his studies have added little to what was already known; and, as the world has long been acquainted with the fact that, in an age of scandalous sexual licence, Napoleon was not a model of conjugal virtue, it is questionable taste, and not much to the purpose, to disclose what the French call "the mysteries of the alcove," to parade the details of his fugitive amours, and to dwell on the lives of his obscure mistresses. I am not surprised that M. Masson has given offence to members of the Bonaparte family, and to adherents of the Bonaparte following; and all that he tells us in these pages about his own political views, his separation from the men who still uphold the standard of the twice fallen Empire, and his own special and devoted cult of Napoleon, is rather out of place and of little interest. The book, nevertheless, is learned and rich in details; and it contains a few particulars I have not met before. I have noticed only two rather absurd mistakes. It was the Orient, not the Ocean (p. 75), that carried Napoleon to Egypt; and the uncle of Marie Louise referred to (p. 272) was the "Duke of Würtzburg," not the "Grand Duke of Würtemberg." Mme. * * * too, need not have been veiled in asterisks; the lady, it is well known, was Mme. Duchâtel.

Napoleon's interview, at the age of eighteen, with a frail nymph of the Palais Royal is some evidence that, even when a boy, he avoided the sin of great cities, repeatedly condemned in his mature writings. I am not sure that he did not feel something like a real attachment at Valence, differing from the flirtations M. Masson speaks of. This is specially recorded in Lanfrey's History, and its object is said to have been a fine lady of rank. His attentions to Eugénie Clary are well known. His heart certainly was not touched; but Bernadotte owed his undeserved honours to this passing fancy of Napoleon's youth; and had Eugénie not become Bernadotte's wife, the fortunes of the Empire might have been different. The spectacle of the beauties of Paris, radiant in the Carnival of Thermidor, had a marked influence on the ardent nature of a young man who had seen nothing of the kind before. Josephine Beauharnais was Napoleon's first great passion. His devotion to this weak and shallow-hearted woman was passionate and intense for years, but all this is sufficiently known; here M. Masson tells us nothing new. It is unnecessary, too, to dwell on the misconduct of Josephine. Soon after her marriage she proved faithless; her levity and prodigality had been long notorious, and, at this time, she did not care for her husband at heart. The remarkable kindliness and good feeling shown by Napoleon in forgiving his wife, at the intercession of Eugénie and Hortense, brings out a side of his character that deserves notice; but the relations of the pair were thenceforward changed. Napoleon, indeed, showed no outward sign that his devotion to Josephine had lessened. She rose with him to the imperial throne; his hand placed an imperial crown on her head; she was constantly at his side in his imperial progresses. He was bound to her, too, by memories of the past; he perceived her value in representation and the pomp of his court; he thought of her as a fond companion and a friend. But respect and genuine love were gone; Napoleon was disenchanted and undeceived; and though certainly he would not have put her away—faded as her beauty was and her fair fame blemished—had she become the mother of an heir to the Empire, he no longer cherished her as a true wife. Josephine, on the other hand, became jealous and captious; she made scenes that did her little credit; her extravagance and frivolous tastes grew worse; and if, as seems probable, she felt, in these years, a devotion for Napoleon she never felt before—self-interest, however, here largely concurred—she was occasionally fretful, capricious, annoying, peevish—a disagreeable woman in short, an unfit helpmeet for a Caesar, who, whatever his faults, had been one of the kindest of lords.

M. Masson sets forth these facts correctly; but he does not place them enough in relief: they reasonably account for a great deal that followed. Napoleon at this time was in the vigour of life; he was tied to an elderly woman he hardly loved; he had half the beauties of Europe at his feet; and the age was one of almost unbridled license. He gradually became an unfaithful husband; had a number of mistresses, some in high places; and, in short, conducted himself in relations of this kind like most of the crowned heads of the day. Yet he never sank into the sty of vice; these passing sirens had no effect on his mind; not one had a shadow of influence with him; with the exception, perhaps, of Marie Walewska, not one seems to have touched his heart. His generosity, too, to these frail creatures, even his care for their reputation, was very striking; and he never flaunted his misdoings in the open day—very different in this from that crapulous being called the First Gentleman of Europe in those times. And if he was not true to a rather unpleasant wife, he long scouted the idea of a divorce, pressed on him by nearly his whole family, and by politicians not wholly swayed by flattery. An accident, perhaps, gave this idea ripeness. He had not hitherto become a father—a fine lady, indeed, had wittily remarked, "On ne peut pas être grand homme en toutes choses"; he possibly doubted if he should have offspring. But a scarcely known mistress bore him a son—the "little Léon"—named in his will; Marie Walewska repeated the gift afterwards; and his thoughts unquestionably then turned to a second marriage. Yet—as M. Masson, who tells the tale of Marie Walewska extremely well, has pointed out accurately—Napoleon fought against a resolve which policy may have chiefly inspired: he often yielded to the pleadings of Joséphine and of the step-children he fondly loved; he rebuked Fouché and others for suggestions on this head. It is unnecessary to refer to the considerate kindness he showed when the divorce was arranged, to the lavish munificence with which Joséphine was treated, to the respect with which she was always surrounded. It may justly be urged that necessity of state required the annulment of this marriage, if it ever did. The pleas advanced for Henry VIII. apply to Napoleon with tenfold force; and it is truly ridiculous to observe how, in this matter, a certain class of writers have described the conduct of Napoleon as that of a brutal adulterer. These scribblers strain at the gnat and swallow the camel in this, as in many other instances: they forget that the head of the Imperial Hapsburgs gave his sanction to this act of Napoleon; they approve of the proceedings against Queen Caroline.

This volume contains rather a good account of the early life of Marie Louise.

She had nothing of Maria Theresa in her, and could never have been a great woman; but she had amiable, even attractive qualities, if her nature was essentially weak and insipid. She was brought up in the worst possible way, under a system of monastic seclusion, and of that overstrained prudery which has so often done fatal mischief to female character, by tickling the imagination and making the mind unhealthy. Napoleon's conduct to her is sufficiently known. He encompassed her with extravagant pomp; he was proud to see her the queen of the continent; he entrusted her with the highest charges of the state; he was prodigal of all kinds of attentions to her. But he did not really love her, we may be assured, in the sense of his first love of Josephine. His letters to her are without depth or passion; he considers her rather as the mother of his son, and the partner of his imperial greatness, than as the object of an attachment springing from the heart. And this, doubtless, and other reasons explain why he was often unfaithful to her, why especially he still clung to Marie Walewska. Unquestionably, too, in Marie Louise's presence he felt something of the awkwardness of the parvenu. She made him feel she was born in the purple, and that he had begun life as an obscure Corsican. There was never between them that chord of sympathy which is formed by similarity of rank and tastes. So far, however, as in her lay, so far as a shallow nature knows what love is, Marie Louise loved Napoleon for a time, though in after years she disavowed the sentiment. She was sent to him as a kind of imperial captive; she regarded her coming fate with aversion and terror; she thought of her future lord as the enemy of her house, as a half barbarian and relentless conqueror. But she was fascinated by the charm Napoleon inspired; she was grateful for his splendid munificence; she was proud of the extraordinary position she owed to him; she was touched, attracted, and became even fond. The true devotion of the heart was, nevertheless, wanting; in her being, indeed, it hardly existed.

I cannot agree with M. Masson that monarchic Europe conspired to make up the marriage of Napoleon and Marie Louise with a view to compass his ruin afterwards. Nor is it the fact that Marie Louise was false to the Emperor in the struggle of 1814. She carried out his behests as Regent; she really sympathised with his short-lived triumphs; she may have felt, as she said, that she had become a Frenchwoman. M. Masson tells a story that would lead us to believe that she informed the Allies of Napoleon's military plans; but he gives no kind of authority for this, and it is contradicted by all the known evidence. The story of the ill-fated woman when the catastrophe came is described in this volume, but the account of Ménéval is more ample and accurate. That account is a most striking example how weakness of character may become wickedness. Marie Louise when she abandoned Paris sincerely wished to rejoin Napoleon, perhaps even to share with him the bread of exile. But she lent an ear to detestable gossip about infidelities laid to his charge—sins which, on an occasion like this, a true woman would have ignored—and her petty nature could not forgive the slight; “she cried petulantly, and with a show of pride.” Then came the abominable intrigues of Metternich, the pleadings of self-interest, the commands of the Allies, and, finally, the adulterous love of Neipperg. Marie Louise threw off Napoleon and fell, a false-hearted and degraded being; but, let us add, the unfortunate victim of one of the most revolting plots which history records. How Napoleon acted to her has been often told. He possibly did not know the whole truth; but he made allowances that few men would have made. He would not listen to evil reports, whether from regard to his son’s fortunes, or from the intense pride which was part of his nature, or simply from a wish to keep up appearances; and he spoke tenderly of his wife in his will. It may be said of this extraordinary man that he was ill-fated in his relations with women. Had Josephine or Marie Louise possessed greatness or strength of character, Napoleon’s career might have been different: he might never have been an unfaithful husband; his private life might have had no stain of vice. But when all the circumstances are fairly weighed, his conduct to women was very different from that which has been described by calumny; and no woman, be it said to his honour, diverted him from his duties as head of the state.

WILLIAM O’CONNOR MORRIS.

The Hero of Esthonia, and other Studies in the Romantic Literature of that Country. Compiled from Esthonian and German Sources by W. F. Kirby. In 2 vols. (Nimmo.)

THE Kalevala has now for some time enjoyed a kind of citizenship among us. Before the appearance of the English translation by Mr. Crawford, we had the German version of Schiefner and the French of Léouzon Le Duc. It was only in the nature of things, especially if we consider the universal enthusiasm for folk-lore, that the Kalevipoeg, the national epic of the Esthonians, should also be presented in an English translation.

The circumstances under which the Kalevala was first brought to the notice of the literary world by Elias Lönnrot in 1835 were perhaps not without suspicion. In the first place, it seemed strange that a people more or less in a rude state should be able to show a completely finished epic divided into books, just as the Temora of Macpherson had its duans. The present century has seen many literary mystifications, from the poems of Clotilde de Surville to the Veda Slovena of Verkovich. Testimony, however, has been borne to the authenticity of at least a great part of the Kalevala, although Lönnrot was in the same happy position as Macpherson: that is to say, he was not obliged to produce any MS. original of what he published. He could assert, as the Scotchman did, that his cantos were taken down from oral recitation. In the same way Surtees produced his “Bartram’s dirge,” and Allan Cunningham palmed off upon Cromeck his fragments of Nithsdale and Galloway songs. But, as we have already said, the Kalevala cannot be considered spurious, since it has been accepted by so many scholars familiar with Finnish literature. It seems, however, generally acknowledged that there has been a certain amount of what we might call adjustment or dove-tailing, so as to form a complete epic. Outsiders would like to know how far this has gone on. Of course many persons who believe in the authenticity, more or less, of “Ossian” are willing to admit that the so-called poems were much tampered with by their supposed translator. So little attention was paid to the Finnish language and literature, until the country passed into the power of the Russians in 1809, that we can easily conceive the existence of a quantity of ballad poetry, which the cultured classes ignored. We are aware it has been denied that the Swedes depressed the national language, but we are unable to see the grounds for such a denial. Whatever may have been the motive of the Russians—and they were probably not sorry to weaken the Swedish element in the country—under their rule the Finnish language began to raise its head. Professors were even allowed to lecture in Finnish; and finally the Kalevala made its appearance, a finished epic which started full-grown like Minerva from the head of Jupiter.

But to return to our immediate subject. The Esthonians, an interesting branch of the great Ugro-Finnish family, whose area has been so accurately marked out in the Comparative Lexicon of Budenz, could hardly boast of any literature at all. Their language had been a tongue of peasants. The condition of these peasants under their German masters, who were feudatory to Poland, was indeed miserable. An old traveller, who published an interesting account of his journey in the Baltic Provinces in 1701, speaking of the nobility among them, says, “they have absolutum imperium, with the power of life and death over their subjects or peasants”; and further on he adds: “They [the peasants] readily submit to the old custom of being whipped with rods for any fault committed.” The earliest documents in their language, consisting of a few sermons, go back no further than the beginning of the seventeenth century.

It is now nearly forty years since the Kalevipoeg was ushered into the literary world, under the auspices of Dr. Kreutzwald. From the letters of this scholar, now dead, we can see that it was pieced together from fragments of genuine popular poetry, very much in the Macphersonian style. It is somewhat curious that Kreutzwald should have recognised here and there a suspicious element in the Kalevala itself. He was better able to do so, because he was no mean adept in the art of such compositions. In one of his letters he speaks of the Kalevala as resembling the Ossianic poems, and adds

Such is the position, then, of the original text of the poem which Mr. Kirby may be said to introduce on this occasion to the British public. Of the Kalevipoeg he does not give us a complete translation, but only a prose summary. This was probably the better course to pursue if he hoped to find any readers, except those of the extreme specialist class. The Kalevipoeg consists of twenty cantos and about 19,000 lines. Mr. Kirby economises space by omitting the numerous lyrical interludes; and in order to enable his readers to follow the thread of the somewhat bewildering story, he gives a short summary of each canto before describing its contents at greater length. He identifies the hero with the Kullervo of the Finnish Kalevala. The condensation of this gigantic epic occupies at least half of our author’s first volume; and then we have a series of folk-tales chiefly taken from the work of Kreutzwald. Frequently it does not appear whether Mr. Kirby is translating from Esthonian or German versions. Of course in such very free and loose adaptations, where the matter is greatly condensed, it is not easy to test his accuracy; but in any case his book remains a valuable contribution to folk-lore. We rather wonder that he quotes Dr. Latham on these matters—a man who did some good service in his day, but in his specimens of Esthonian songs (as given, for example, in his Russian and Turk, 1878) he confessedly translates from Neus. His versions, therefore, are only translations from translations. This certainly takes away much of the poetry, but probably does not render the poem less serviceable, if we merely wish to extract folk-lore from it.

The tales which Mr. Kirby has selected are wild and fanciful. We can easily understand how, to our simple-minded ancestors, the country of the Finns and Lapps was the abode of witches, such as Milton has described in the often-quoted lines. This country was to the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries what Thessaly was to the Greeks and Romans. From these boreal regions, with their snows and mists, came the witches who daily prophesied the fate of the terrible Ivan of Russia, as the quaint Horsey has told us. Many of the elements of the tales are familiar from the folk-lore of other countries: the dogmen, the dwarfs malicious or otherwise, the wonderful smiths, the snoring giants, the mermaids and the will-o’-the-wisps. The section in vol. ii. devoted to stories of the gods and spirits of the elements strikes us as likely to prove interesting to all folk-lorists. Under the title of “Cosmopolitan Stories,” Mr. Kirby gives us a large number of those which are in vogue in countries much further west: thus, we have replicas of Bluebeard, Cinderella, Polyphemus, and Red Riding Hood. In the improbabilities which follow upon one another in these tales we are frequently reminded of the Slavonic legends; perhaps, however, generally speaking, they are not so picturesque. Of the date of many of them it would be difficult to conjecture, as folk-tales are so constantly interlarded with additions and modified in expression. Certainly, here and there we get a modern air of sentimentalism which we should not expect to find among the really ancient tales of so rude a people; as, for instance, when we read (p. 134): "There was no sound but the sighing of the wind and the moan of the distant sea." Other similar passages may be found which analyse the emotions in a manner alien to the directness—we might almost say, abruptness—of the genuine folk-tale. Many of them, from other points of view, appear very modern indeed.

At the conclusion of the second volume Mr. Kirby gives us some translations of passages of the Kalevipoeg in the metre which has become so familiar to us from its having been adopted by Longfellow in his "Hiawatha." The concluding charm against snake-bite is curious. There is something in it like Shakspeare's song in "Midsummer Night's Dream," "Ye spotted snakes," &c. The bibliography at the end forms a useful addition zur Orientierung, as the Germans would say. From it we see that as long ago as 1868 Mr. Baring-Gould gave an account of the poem in Fraser's. It is strange to find that as early as 1795 a notice of Esthonian literature was published in London. That the Esthonians should have been regarded as "Slavonians" at that time was only natural in the confused condition of ethnology. Even the once renowned Dr. Dunham, nearly forty years later, in the beginning of his History of Poland, makes the strange statement that the Lithuanian and Finnish languages are identical. Mais nous avons changé tout cela; and now every schoolboy can classify the Aryan languages for us.

But, after all, the names of Kreutzwald and Neus must be held as the guarantees of the genuineness of such Esthonian literature as has been published. That so eminent a scholar as the late Alexander Schiefner should have believed the Kalevipoeg—at least in parts—to be a real national song is a valuable testimony to its authenticity. And now, thanks to Mr. Kirby's labours, English folk-lore—for it is they who will chiefly take interest in the book—will be able to criticise the Sagas of the land of marshes inhabited by the strange race which has no history, and has slowly retired before the great Aryan waves of conquest or become engulfed in them.

W. R. MORFILL.

Poems, Old and New. By George Cotterell. (David Nutt.)

THERE is one quality in poetry which is not adequately recognised. This quality pertains in particular to physiognomic poetry, that which bears unmistakably the impress of a creative individuality. While, to mere "attractiveness," it is what courtesy is to politeness; to charm, it holds the relationship of fancy to imagination. This quality is winsomeness.

Of course by the word charm something more is meant than that which is charming. Charm is the magic moonlight of art. That which is charming may be anything from a dainty triolet to a sonnet-sequence: the faculty "to be charming" is sometimes innate, sometimes a knack, sometimes fortuitous, sometimes controlled and directed skill. But charm eludes the most wary seeker among those who are not natural heritors of its priceless secret. It is a thing apart.

This bloom, this fragrance, which is to the flower of poetry what expression is to human beauty, rests primarily upon that which is rare and distinctive. It is the adornment of simplicity, rather than of what is impressive by reason of brave similitudes and hazardous audacities. Naturally it is claimed by the presumptuous, and is travestied by them. Unfortunately, the large uncultured public, or, rather, that public whose culture is restricted and collective rather than catholic and individual, is ever apt not only to debase charm by the application to it of the term "charming," but to accept the trained artifice of the cage-bird for the sweet waywardness of the wood-note wild. Pre-eminently, the minor poetry of our day is "charming": but only in the occasional lyric excellence of one or two of our younger poets do I find charm—in that high sense of the word which it is meant to convey when wedded to mention of "La Belle Dame sans Merci," or the "Ode to a Nightingale," or that on Melancholy, or to "Kubla Khan."

Winsomeness, however, has no narrow significance: it is a word of many vistas, of far horizons, as, for example, are "style," "beauty," "spiritual," "Schwärmerei." It is a physiognomic expression akin to charm. The more rare of the two is discoverable only on the high planes of genius, though genius may frequently lack it; the less rare, though never common, may be, and perhaps generally is, native to the lower slopes. The familiar sophistry, that genius is one and indivisible, and can have no degrees of comparison, because it either is or is not, would set itself over against this distinction; but, as is of course logically demonstrable, there are degrees in genius, as in spirituality, virtue, fortitude, or as in the converse of these. The fellowship of genius is an equal brotherhood: its motto, de facto as well as de jure, "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity." So, in the communion of the saints, all are saintly; but the seraphim are above the angels, and the Powers above the seraphim, and the Dominions above the Powers.

It is, accordingly, in no veiled deprecation, but with recognition of one of the most delightful qualities of poetry, that I particularise winsomeness as the distinctive characteristic of the Poems: Old and New, of Mr. George Cotterell. These poems are the blooming of an aloe, and that aloe is the poet's inner life. Poems: Old and New is the only book of a poet who for many years has contributed verse occasionally to weekly and monthly periodicals, of a critic of taste at once catholic and severe, of a writer of quiet distinction. If it has the slight faults of proportion incidental to a promiscuous gleaming among the harvests of youth, early manhood, and middle age, it has the advantage of an anthology: we may be sure that we have here what the author himself regards as his best and most representative.

Obviously these poems are not arranged chronologically. It requires little critical insight to discern that the narrative poem

"Constance," at the end of the volume, and its immediate predecessor, "Nathan," while the work of the same man who writes the "Prelude," are not the achievement of the same artist. They are graceful in imagery, delicate and fine in sentiment, and have the atmosphere of poetry; but they are less mature, both in style and thought. Keats is the star by which this pilgrim of song steered his "poetic barque" in his early voyages. "Constance" is, in conception, inferior to its companions, but is wrought with all the compelling heed of the poet in love with his theme. "Violets" is probably of later date. It is one of the most intimate poems in the book; and though allied in scope and method to the English idylls of Tennyson, it has a strong personal and distinctive note. "Still with a conscious effort to be at rest" is, however, one of the lines in this blank verse poem which cannot be accepted as a decasyllabic heroic, even with the obvious demand upon elision. "Nathan," again, is finely conceived and finely done.

So much for the early poems, though they are not thus distinguished in Mr. Cotterell's volume, where, indeed, they occupy the final pages, which might be supposed to hold the latest writings. A marked maturity of thought and style distinguishes from them poems such as "Arethusa" and "The Coming of May," "Pansies" and "The Return of the Wanderer," and, in particular, from what is, in the estimation of the present writer, the most delightful lyrical composition in the collection, the "Prelude." This is a dedicatory poem, filled with a sweet and grave seriousness, which must appeal to all readers. The short, rippling, irregular quatrains are indicated as having been written "above Glen Fruin," the lovely strath which divides the salt fjord of the Gairloch from the land-girt waters of Loch Lomond.

"A climb in clear September weather,
Up hills we should have climbed together,
You, dear, and I,
Through belts of heather.

"But eastward to my westward, nigh
That Northern Sea we sojourned by,
You kept your tether,
And let me fly.

"Ah well: the wanderer from the nest
Comes from his wanderings back to rest;
His happy fate
Blends rest and guest.

"But sitting here,
With all this ample prospect near—
Broad glen, deep glade, Mountain and mere—

"I feel you east and west pervade,
Your magic plays with light and shade,
Makes far things clear,
While near things fade;

"For, with a necromancer's spell
That works some wonder passing well,
As fair to see
As strange to tell,

"The thought of you brings back to me,
With yet a finer wizardry,
The surge and swell
Of memory.

"These, on my mount of vision here,
Come back to me with smile and tear,
The thought of you
Has brought them near;

"Has given the sky a lovelier blue,
And opened to my longing view Vistas more clear, Horizons new."

A delicate and reserved intimacy with Nature is manifest throughout this volume, and particularly in the several flower and bird pieces near the beginning, all of which have a sweet lyric flow and a delightful abandon. Of these, "Pansies" is perhaps the most haunting.

"Flowers, sweet flowers, for Psyche my bride,
I planted them long ago;
I tended them well at eventide,
And the morrow saw them blow—
Lily and rose and violet,
Tall moon-daisies and poppies fine,
Patches of fragrant mignonette,
And wings of columbine:
And I said when I saw how fair they were,
'O, glad will my Psyche be!
The fairest flowers for a bride more fair,
And the fairest bride for me.'"

Through obvious symbols the poet proceeds to tell his story, a story germane to the experience of each of us who have in any way loved, suffered in love, and known the resurrection of love. The poem is one of singular beauty. A fine lyric emotion, a liberal music, characterise "On a Cliff," where the lift of the sea-wind and the chime of the waves far below afford to the singer something of their blithe rhythm. Among the several poems of places, I am glad to see some lines inspired by Loch Duich, one of the loveliest, though least known, of the Highland lochs. "Galatea" would be wholly delightful, were it not just a little reminiscent of the most perilous of all masters to follow. The Swinburnian music is always unmistakable, however cunning and deft the Marsyas who would cope with him on that "Rare lute that none outvies,

Or thrills, so, all the scale."

But in "Arethusa" we have a poem in irregular, rhymeless measures which is all the poet's own, and a very charming "own."

With "Arethusa" I imagine that the later poems give place to those of earlier date. On the whole these do not seem to me so excellent, so convincing, despite the unmistakable charm of a poem such as "The Hesperides." But among them are lovely pieces; none, to my mind, superior to "In the Twilight," with its grave music:

"Far off? Not far away
Lies that fair land;
Shut from the curious gaze by day,
Hidden, but close at hand;
Let us seek it who may.

"Is it not a land like ours?
Nay, much more fair;
Sweeter flowers than earthly flowers
Shed their fragrance there,
Faded not with the passing hours.

"Soft are all the airs that blow,
Breathing of love;
Dreaming soft the vales below,
The skies above,
And all the murmuring streams that flow.

"There are daughters of beauty, the host
Of nymphs of old time;
All the loves of the poets who boast
Of their loves in their rhyme—
Loves won, and the sadder loves lost.

"Fair, passionless creatures of thought,
Most fair, most calm;
The joy of whose beauty has brought
To the soul its own balm;
Not desire that cometh to nought."

Here I must take leave of a book whose distinctive characteristic is, as I have said, winsomeness: the winsomeness of severe thought and delicate sentiment, finely and soberly expressed.

MR. LESTER'S Queen of the Hamlet is by no means equal to the same author's Hartas Maturin. It has not the same vigour and originality; and yet it is decidedly above the average, and contains more than one scene of excellence. The old maiden lady who owns the village of Mallow, and rules it with a rod of iron, is drawn admirably. Mingled with her denunciations of the new social order and her mission to crush vice, dissent, and Radical politics—which with her are only different forms of the upas tree of evil—there is a strange touch of romance connected with the vicar, whom she had loved in her youth, but who had passed her by for a more comely partner. The vicar's daughter, Dorothy Hemming, is a charming creature; and her unconventional wooing by the musical genius Clive—who turns out to be a wealthy suitor—is told with real spirit and many an amusing contretemps. Prof. Bannerstaff, who made it profitable to reconcile science and theology by well-paid lectures, is a humbug; but we forgive him a good deal for the sake of his daughter Miriam. Excellent, too, is Miss Rachel Strutt, the younger sister of the lady of the manor, over whom the great woman rides rough-shod. Where the story fails, is in its lack of a strong consecutive interest. It has little that can be called a plot; yet it is in parts very bright and sparkling, and Mr. Lester's whimsical humour finds frequent vent in the episodes of village life. The last scene of all has a genuine touch of the pathetic about it.

Mrs. Lovett Cameron writes with such vivacity, and elaborates her plots so skillfully, that it is a pity she does not choose more elevating subjects. Here, for example, is her latest story, A Bad Lot. We defy any one to get up a real interest in the characters. They almost all belong to the seamy side of life, while Julian Temple, who is considerably better than the rest, is vague and shadowy. The "bad lot" referred to is the family of Gordon Forrester. First there is the father himself, a man of good birth, who does not think it beneath him to live upon small tradesmen, whom he anathematizes when they apply for what is their due. The only smart thing in the book is the remark which he makes to a friend whom he has victimised for £50, when he assures him that after his death there will be found written upon his heart the words, "To account rendered." His whole existence consisted of a series of petty shifts to avoid the Bankruptcy Court. Forrester had three daughters. The eldest, Dorothea, or "Dottie," was a tall, large-made young woman, of Juno-like proportions, who had a "book" on every turf event as it came round; the second, Millicent, was a good horsewoman, an excellent billiard and tennis player, who smoked cigarettes in public and a short black pipe in private; and the third, Eleanor or Nelly, was certainly the best in the bunch—yet she, when at innocent sixteen, was invited to elope by the greatest villain in the novel, Colonel Vane Darley, who had a wife living in America. But the most despicable of all the characters—for there was something good in all those above-mentioned—is a Mrs. Hartwood, the widow of a clergyman, who was so utterly base as to take from a youth dying of consumption his clever original designs and pay him fourpence each, she herself receiving fifteen shillings for them as her own productions. Nelly Forrester was engaged to a priggish young barrister, Cecil Roscoe, who unceremoniously threw her over when he heard of stories to her discredit. She was thoroughly pure and innocent, however, and in the end Julian Temple discovered her worth and married her. The present story is the thinnest and poorest of the author's which we remember to have read.

We regret that Miss Le Clerc has chosen certain phases of the Irish question as the groundwork of her new book. She has written several charming novels before this; indeed, her Mistress Beatrice Cope would do no discredit to any living writer of historical novels; and for this reason her new venture is all the more disappointing. There are isolated passages of considerable power in it, but the gloom of Irish boycotting hangs over all. The Moreen family, who are alleged to be laid under the ban, are a good and kindly-disposed race; and we have great sympathy for Francis Scanlan, a man of superior mental powers, who has been dragged into the position of leader of the disaffected Irish almost against his will. The incidents may or may not be founded on fact; but the whole tone of the narrative is against the peasantry and in favour of the squireen, and here is ground at once for dividing readers into two hostile camps.

A Life for a Love is a story of a more sensational type than Mrs. Meade usually writes. Mortimer Paget, the head of a great city house, has a beautiful daughter named Valentine, who is wooed by Gerald Wyndham. He is allowed to marry her, after a mysterious conference with her father, the upshot of which is that after a year's wedded happiness Gerald is to go out to the Antipodes, and is never to be heard of again. His life has been heavily insured in various offices; and he is to sacrifice himself in order that Mr. Paget may repay by means of his insurance money a sum of £80,000 left with him in trust for another. We shall not trace the fortunes or rather the misfortunes of Wyndham, who is supposed to be dead, but reappears after three years. His constitution, however, has really broken down, and he dies after some momentary gleams of happiness, following upon the reunion with his wife. She is a noble woman, and after the death of her husband she surrenders everything in order to discharge her father's indebtedness. The narrative is interesting enough, though wildly improbable. We noticed several excruciating misprints. The author of The Evidences of Christianity is spoken of as Pailey, and the famous line in Keble's hymn is quoted, "Son of my soul." There are several good studies of children in the volume.

It would be impossible to read Zachary Brough's Venture without feeling the emotions deeply stirred. Indeed, the story is almost too painful in its pathos. Brough is a straightforward Christian man, without cant, who fills his life with good deeds. His last "venture" is a noble effort to restore to sanity and usefulness a brilliant artist, who has wrecked his life and brought his wife to the grave by his passion for strong drink. The artist's little daughter, and a sterling little fellow named Chris, aid in the good work, and after a desperate struggle they succeed. The whole tone of the narrative is of an elevating order, and the style in which it is written is clear and effective.

Sensationalism run mad might fitly describe Sister Angela. Twice the heroine saves her husband from death, only to be parted from him by his fiendish mother and her daughter, who are plotting to secure him as the husband of the latter. The daughter has no real affection for him, but an enormous fortune hangs upon his capture by the matrimonial schemers. They are just on the verge of success, when all their plans collapse like a house of cards, in consequence of a succession of startling incidents.

The heroine of Mr. Locke's story is a young lady artist with strong Bohemian proclivities. From the superior heights of genius and unconventionality she loathes her less gifted relatives in the country, and her great soul is straitened until she emancipates herself. Flying to London she enters upon an artistic career; and her striking appearance captivates first a moral young fellow named Kent, and then an immoral young fellow named Thornton Hammerdyke. She marries the latter, and a very distressing time they have of it. There is a good deal of the animal in both of them; and although Hammerdyke is a brute, and behaves with great cruelty towards his wife, we cannot say that we care for the lady herself. Hammerdyke was a celebrated traveller, and one of the incidents in his early career was a wholesale slaughter of niggers. After his marriage he foreswore Africa, and tossed up as to whether he should go into politics or on the turf. Politics won; but after some truculent experiences—during which his wife separated from him because he had violently assaulted her—the political sphere failed him. Once more he went abroad, the Belgian Government having commissioned him to reform the administration in a wide tract of country, whose borders were infested with Arabs. Here he had the decency to get himself killed, which left the way free for his wife to marry Kent. The title of this novel—At the Gate of Samaria—furnishes no idea of its substance. Though by no means destitute of ability, it belongs to a class of which we are utterly wearied.

Raymond's Folly is intended to teach that every man is the architect of his own future. Raymond Hayles built very badly: in fact, he was a wicked young man, who threw over a good young lady for a frivolous one. When he found out his mistake, he wanted to go back to his first love without any marriage ceremony. But the good young lady withered him up with her scorn, and he went from bad to worse. He came to see his mistakes, however, in the end, but his highly moral brother had already won his old flame for his bride. The story has no pretensions to literary merit, and the religious adjurations of some of the characters are rather too obtrusive.

The opening of The Accountant is certainly unusual; for we there find a dying doctor leaving a good sum of money to his two supposed nieces, but accompanying the bequest with the unpleasant information that they are his illegitimate daughters. The "accountant" is the son of the doctor's old friend Greig; and he, on application, is to steer them through any difficulties they may fall into. We are not greatly enamoured of Cosmo Greig, nor, indeed, of any of the characters, among whom is a very bad "bookmaker," who comes to a terrible end.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Diary of Anna Green Winslow: a Boston School Girl of 1771. Edited by Alice Morse Earle. (Archibald Constable.) The researches of Miss Earle into the manners and customs of New England in the olden time have already resulted in two highly interesting volumes about the early Puritans. The present contribution to the subject has reference to a somewhat later date. The diary, as here given, was commenced near the close of 1771 and continued for a year and a half, the last entry being dated May 31, 1773. The writer was between ten and twelve years of age, but the style might well suggest a much older girl. Childlike simplicity and directness are, however, visible throughout. The language is nicely chosen, although sometimes pedantic—"this day, the extremity of the cold is somewhat abated" rivals a famous early utterance of Macaulay's—and the ideas expressed indicate great intelligence. "It is an even chance," says Miss Earle, in her graceful "Foreword," "which ruling thought in the clever little writer—a love of religion or a love of dress—shows most plainly." The vanity, however, is perfectly innocent, and the piety entirely free from priggishness. The writer, although modest, is not blind to her rights and dignity. Thus, after for some time sending her journal to her parents jointly, she addresses a protest to her mother: "My Hon^d Papa has never signified to me his approbation of my journals, from whence I infer, that he either never reads them, or does not give himself the trouble to remember any of their contents, tho' some part has been address'd to him, so, for the future, I shall trouble only you with this part of my scribble." In another place a critical spirit manifests itself, for, when the Rev. Mr. Hunt makes a pastoral call—"After the usual salutations and 'When did you hear from your papa,' &c., I ask'd him if the blessing pronounced by the minister before the congregation is dismissed is not a part of publick worship? 'Yes.' 'Why, then, do you, Sir, say, 'Let us conclude the publick worship by singing?'" The allusions to literature are not numerous. Mention is made of a New Year gift of "The History of Joseph Andrews abbreviated. In nice Guilt and flowers covers"; and, as a consequence, a few days later, we find that the diarist's aunt (with whom she lived) has been comparing the Rev. Dr. Pemberton, rolling up the pulpit stairs, to Parson Trulliber. On another occasion a reference occurs to a copy of Gulliver's Travels, "abbreviated" lent by a cousin "which aunt says I may read for the sake of perfecting myself in reading a variety of composures." Incidentally, we learn the fate of a certain Betty Smith, whom Mrs. Winslow had once tried to reform; but in vain, for "no sooner was the 29th Regiment encamp'd upon the common, but Miss Betty took herself among them (as the Irish say), and there she stay'd with Bill Pinchion and awhile." Then she got into jail for stealing, and made an appearance at the "publick whipping post." All which Puritan methods for moral reform failed, for she took to stealing again, and the inevitable end is noted in a way which shows that, in those times, it was a common enough matter: "Last Wednesday Bet Smith was set upon the gallows. She behav'd with great impudence. Thursday I danc'd a minuet and country dances at school." A fashion of headdress of that day—worse even than the fearful "chignon" of a later period—is thus graphically described:

"I had my heddu roll on, Aunt Storer said it ought to be made less, Aunt Deming said it ought not to be made at all. It makes my head itch and ach, and burn like anything, Mamma. This famous roll is not made icholly of a red Cow Tail, but is a mixture of that and horsehair (very coarse) and a little human hair of yellow hue, that I suppose was taken out of the back part of an old wig. . . . Nothing renders a young person more amiable than virtue and modesty without the help of fals hair, red Cow Tail and D— (the barber)."

The book is a pleasing and touching little record of a few months in a short, simple and happy life, for the writer died when she was nineteen years old. With the aid of Miss Earle's excellent notes, it is valuable for the light it throws on the social life of New England just before the Revolution.

Maximilian and Carlotta. A Story of Imperialism. By John M. Taylor. (G. P. Putnam's Sons.) We had lately to review Mr. Burke's Life of Juarez (ACADEMY, June 2, 1894), in which the reign of Maximilian was treated from the point of view of a Mexican Liberal. Here we have the same career dealt with from the point of view of the United States. The two accounts do not differ essentially. Mr. Taylor is more touched with pity for the fate of Maximilian and Carlotta: he is more in sympathy with what was chivalrous in their action; but, unconsciously, unwillingly as it were, the real weakness of Maximilian's conduct is disclosed here even more fully than in Mr. Burke's volume. None but a weak man would have penned the excessive longing for the mere trappings and pageant of royalty, which is quoted on p. 96, and this nine years before the offer of the Empire of Mexico was made to him. None but a weak man would have believed in the literal truth of Estrada's words in presenting the crown. And throughout his career it was the same: he went to Mexico relying on the clerical and conservative party, and at once he offended them without gaining any of the Liberals. He never seems to have taken the action of the United States into account at all; yet they were the real masters of the situation. He could not see how impossible it was for Napoleon III. to help him when once the United States had made their decision known, with three such generals as Grant, Sherman, and Sheridan, and a million of men behind them to enforce that decision. Every opportunity was given him to retire with dignity, like Amadéo did from Spain a little later, and even to make his personal escape, when the retribution he had brought upon himself by the infamous decree against which his Belgian soldiers protested was close at hand. This is the story told here with enthusiastic admiration of Carlotta, with full appreciation of the better qualities of Maximilian, but also showing conclusively the inherent hopelessness of the attempt, when once it was seen that the Confederate States must fall before the armies of the Union. There is a provoking absence of dates to many of the official papers and letters quoted. The value given to some of the hasty opinions of the European press of the day almost raises a smile; but this is more than counterbalanced by the utterances of American statesmen and generals here given. The word "Mexican" throughout is used in a peculiar sense, being restricted to the white inhabitants of Mexico. This is significant. The book will interest all who wish to read the story of Maximilian and Carlotta from the writer's point of view; and, after all, this is the one most to be considered.

Elizabeth Jane Whately: Reminiscences of her Life and Work. By her Sister. (Seeley.) This memoir of one of the gifted daughters of Archbishop Whately will be read with interest in many a land. Miss Whately's life was one of almost constant travel, sojourning for a few months, according to the season and the requirements of her feeble health, in Cairo, Italy, Switzerland, Belgium, France, or Spain. Wherever she went she joined herself to fellow-workers in the cause of spreading Evangelical Protestantism. By these she will be much missed, by them her memory will be highly cherished, and to them this little memoir will be most welcome. For others, from a literary point of view, it is marred by a certain vagueness. The authoress forgets that all her readers are not so well acquainted with the relationships of the Whately family as she is herself; and it is difficult for a stranger to make out who "her family" are at a given date, or to guess who are the unnamed married nieces whom she visits. The same fault is seen in the description of her work in Spain, in Switzerland, in Italy: we need to know far more definitely the localities and persons before we can take real interest in the story.

The Writings of Thomas Paine. Collected and edited by Moncure Daniel Conway.

Vol. II. (G. P. Putnam's Sons.) This volume covers the period from 1779 to 1792. The principal item, both in length and importance, is the "Rights of Man," the second part of which was published in the latter year. Mr. Conway prefaces it with an interesting explanatory note, in which he is, we think, unnecessarily severe on Burke. It is not essential for the justification of Paine that we should underrate the merits of his formidable opponent. Another interesting item is "Dissertations on Government: the Affairs of the Bank, and Paper Money," a political pamphlet issued in Philadelphia in 1786. Herein Paine discourses on the subject of paper money with his usual common sense. The editor's work throughout the volume is careful and conscientious.

El Doctor Wolski; Paginas de Polonia y de Rusia. (Madrid.) This novel is written by a Spanish lady resident in Russia, who knows intimately the locality which she describes. The theme is the struggle between the persistent optimistic temperament of the Pole and the cynical pessimism of the Russian, which ends in Nihilism. The scene is laid on the Volga, and the story shows how many are the festering sores in Eastern Russia, and the large element of wild barbarism, which still exists there, to thwart every effort of the philanthropist. The plot is not skilfully constructed; the merit of the work lies in the descriptions, and in the separate situations, which have an air of truth.

NOTES AND NEWS.

UNDER the title of "Illustrated Standard Novels," Messrs. Macmillan & Co. propose to publish a series of reprints of famous works of fiction, which may fairly be considered to have taken an established place in English literature. Each novel will have for introduction a prefatory notice written by a critic of distinction, and each volume will contain about forty full-page and other illustrations. The first volume of the series, to be published on January 15, will be Maria Edgeworth's Castle Rackrent and The Absentee, illustrated by Miss Chris Hammond, with an introduction by Anne Thackeray Ritchie. This will be followed, at intervals of one month, by Captain Marryat's Japhet in Search of a Father, with an introduction by Mr. David Hannay, and by Michael Scott's Tom Cringle's Log, with an introduction by Mr. Mowbray Morris. Among the authors to be represented later are: Jane Austen, Susan Ferrier, Thomas Love Peacock, Thomas Galt, and George Borrow.

PROF. C. H. HERFORD, of Aberystwith, has undertaken to edit, for Messrs. Blackie & Son, a series under the title of "The Warwick Library," which will aim at presenting some of the masterpieces of English literature in a new garb. Each volume will deal with the development of some special literary form, will be illustrated by a series of representative specimens, sparsely annotated, and will be preceded by a critical and analytical introduction. The first volume, Pastoral Poetry, with an introduction by Mr. E. K. Chambers, will be ready before Easter. Prof. C. E. Vaughan will be responsible for a volume on Literary Criticism, Prof. Raleigh for one on English Letter-Writers, while a volume of Tales in Verse will be the editor's own contribution. Other volumes will follow.

MESSRS. RICHARD BENTLEY & SON announce the Reminiscences of the late Mrs. de Morgan, edited by her daughter, and illustrated with a portrait. The volume will also contain some letters addressed to Prof. de Morgan and his wife.

MESSRS. LONGMANS have in the press The Evolution of Whist, by Dr. William Pole, being a study of the progressive changes which the game has undergone from its origin to the present time.

THE second volume of the re-issue of the "English Men of Letters" series, to be published about the middle of January, will contain Mark Pattison's Milton, Mr. William Black's Goldsmith, and Mr. Goldwin Smith's Cowper.

THE latest list of the announcements of the Kelmescott Press includes a new prose romance by Mr. William Morris himself, entitled Child Christopher. It will occupy about three hundred 16mo pages, and will be printed in black and red, in the Chaucer type, with new borders. The edition is to be limited to 600 copies.

PROBABLY the largest price ever asked for a new book is the 120 guineas demanded for a vellum copy of the Chaucer folio, now being printed at the Kelmescott Press, with woodcuts designed by Sir E. Burne-Jones, and large ornamental borders by Mr. William Morris. The copies printed on paper have all been bought already.

A NEW volume of short stories by Andreas Burger, entitled Thistledown and Mustard Seed, is announced by Mr. Elliot Stock for early publication; and also an English translation of Schaeffer's New Year's Eve, by Paul Kuntz.

THE illustrated edition of Mr. Crockett's The Stickler Minister is already completely sold out, and The Playactress of the same writer will enter its second edition next week.

WE have received a prospectus of "The Bibliographer's Manual of Gloucestershire Literature," being a classified catalogue of books, pamphlets, broadsides, and other printed matter relating to the county of Gloucester, or to the city of Bristol, with descriptive and explanatory notes. The joint authors, who have been engaged on the work for seven years past, are Mr. F. A. Hyett, deputy-chairman of the Gloucestershire quarter sessions, and the Rev. W. Bazeley, rector of Matson, near Gloucester. They have strictly confined themselves to books of topographical interest: that is to say, they have excluded, for the most part, works on general subjects, whose only association with the county is that they are by local authors, or were locally printed. But for the class of books they do record, they have searched all public and private libraries; and they have been careful not only to describe accurately every book, but also to mention where a copy is to be found. The mode of arrangement adopted is: (1) works relating to the county generally, (2) those relating to the Forest of Dean, (3) those relating to particular parishes and towns, (4) those relating to Bristol. In addition to an index of authors and local printers, there will be a special bibliography of Chatterton and the Rowley Poems. The work will form three volumes of not less than 400 pages each, the first of which will be ready early next year. It is being printed by Mr. John Bellows, of Gloucester; and the number of copies will be strictly limited to the number of subscribers.

A COMMITTEE has been formed—of which the Rev. W. E. Collins, professor of ecclesiastical history at King's College, is secretary—to commemorate the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the death of Archbishop Laud. Special services will be held, on January 10, in the old parish church of Allhallows, Barking, where his body was buried before its final removal to the chapel of St. John's College, Oxford. A course of five lectures will be delivered in the church, among which we may mention: "Laud's General Position in relation to the Church of England," by Bishop Creighton; "Laud's Educational Work," by Prof.

D. S. Margoliouth; and "Laud's Personal Religion," by the Rev. C. H. Simpkinson. An exhibition will also be held in the parish schoolroom of MSS., pictures, and objects of interest associated with Laud and his times. St. John's College, Oxford, has promised to lend his autograph diary, the Vandyke portrait, and a bust by Sueur; St. John's Cambridge, the copy of the Coronation Office of Charles I., in his handwriting, which was recently edited by the Rev. Christopher Wordsworth for the Henry Bradshaw Society; while from Lambeth Palace Library are coming two volumes containing autograph letters and several books bearing his signature. A full Laudian bibliography is being drawn up; and it is hoped that this, together with the lectures and the catalogue of the exhibition, may be published as a permanent memorial of the commemoration.

DR. KARL LENTZNER, of Oxford, has been delivering during the present week a course of four Christmas lectures at the Portman Rooms, Baker-street, on "Hans Christian Andersen, the Danish Prose Poet."

THE programme of the Goldsmiths' Institute Literary Society for the coming quarter includes a revival of the Bacon-Shakspeare discussion, to be opened in favour of the former by Colonel Maude, V.C., C.B., Mr. George R. Humphery defending the other side. Mr. Ernest Aston will read a paper on "The Place of Pope in English Literature," Mr. Arthur Wood on "The Characters of Pickwick and Don Quixote," and Mr. A. T. White on "Milton's Shorter Poems." There will also be a recital and criticism of "She Stoops to Conquer."

THE eighth annual general meeting of the New Spalding Club was held at Aberdeen in the hall of the Society of Advocates on December 21. The two volumes to be issued to members for 1895 are: "Historical Papers Relating to the Jacobite Period, 1699-1750," edited by Col. James Allardyce; and vol. ii. of "Musa Latina Aberdonensis," edited by Principal Sir William D. Geddes. The following are also stated to be in progress: "Bibliography of the Shires of Aberdeen, Banff, and Kincardine," edited by A. W. Robertson, of the Aberdeen Public Library; vol. ii. of the "Fasti Academiæ Mariscallanæ," by P. J. Anderson, of the Aberdeen University Library; "Folk-lore of North-Eastern Scotland," by the Rev. Dr. Walter Gregor, of Pitsligo; "Diary of the Scots College at Douai, and Necrologies of the Scots Colleges at Ratisbon and Paris," by the Rev. W. Forbes-Leith, S.J., of Selkirk; "Register of the Scots College at Rome," by Monsignor Campbell; "Records from the Archives of Middelburg, Flushing, Campvere, &c.," by the Rev. A. W. Frater, minister of the Scotch Church at Middelburg; "History of the Family of Burnett," by the late Lyon, Dr. George Burnett, and Dr. Murray Rose; "Place Names of Aberdeenshire," by James Macdonald, of Huntley; "Records of the Presbytery of Alford, 1662-88," by the Rev. Thomas Bell; "Records of the Synod of Moray, with a Fasti of Schoolmasters," by the Rev. Stephen Ree; "Papers of David Skene, M.D.," by Prof. J. W. H. Trail.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

WE are asked to state that the retirement of Mr. Archibald Grove from the editorship of the New Review is occasioned by the pressure on his time caused by his Parliamentary duties. No change will take place in the independent and open lines on which the review has always been conducted.

MR. JOHN MURRAY will contribute "Some Reminiscences of a Publisher" to Good Words during 1895; Mr. William Canton will write brief monthly notices of current literature; and unpublished letters of Mrs. Gaskell, Bernard Barton, and Miss Mitford will also appear.

IN the fifth series of the Expositor, which begins with the January number, we are told that greater space will be given to popular expository papers. But we are also promised articles on "The Zeitgeist in Criticism," by Prof. Sanday; on "Some Problems in Prophecy," by Prof. Cheyne; on "The Hebrew Patriarchs," by Prof. Ryle; and "Old Testament Expositions," by Prof. G. A. Smith. Contributions are also expected from Dr. George Salmon, Prof. H. B. Swete, and Prof. A. B. Davidson.

THE January number of the Expository Times will contain an article of some length on the New Syriac Gospels, by the Rev. G. H. Gwilliam, who is editing the Peshitto for the Clarendon Press.

THE programme of the new volume of the Monthly Packet includes two serials—"The Green Garland," by Frances E. Crompton, and a new story by the author of "Tip-Cat," besides a complete short story every month; there will also be, in succession, two series of provincial sketches—"Glenbruar Episodes," by Fergus Mackenzie, and "Folk of the Fylde," by Roma White; Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse will conclude his account of the Italian Schools in the National Gallery; and Mr. Phil Robinson will contribute a series of six studies on Shakspeare's Plant-lore.

AN American edition of the Bookman will in the future be published by Messrs. Dodd, Mead & Co.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

MR. F. YORK POWELL, of Christ Church, who more than once acted as deputy to Prof. Freeman, has been nominated regius professor of modern history at Oxford, in succession to Mr. J. A. Froude. It is understood that Mr. S. R. Gardiner—to whom all eyes turned on the occasion of Mr. Froude's death—was unwilling to accept a post that might interfere with his life-long devotion to the history of the Stuart period. While we cannot but regret this self-denying ordinance, we believe that the faculty of history at Oxford—if it had been consulted about the appointment—would have agreed in recommending Mr. York Powell en seconde ligne.

A FUND is now being raised at Cambridge for the establishment of a Lectureship in English Literature, for which there is great need. The lecturers at present are paid by fees only, and the sums received from this source are sadly inadequate for the purpose. The least sum that will suffice for a permanent Lectureship is from £1,600 to £1,700, and even this will only secure about £50 a year. The resources of the University are practically exhausted; and the sole remaining way of providing the money is by a fund raised specially for the purpose. An excellent beginning has been made. The sum of 200 guineas has been generously offered by the Merchant Taylors' Company, and an equal sum has been received from an anonymous donor. Mr. Mocatta has promised £100; and £50 each has been offered by the late Mr. Sanders and by Prof. Skeat. In all, the amount of £900 has been already nearly attained—sufficient to render it in the highest degree desirable that the attempt should not be allowed to collapse. The chief hope of assistance is from former alumni of the University. The treasurer is the Rev. Prof. Skeat, 2, Salisbury-villas, Cambridge, to whom all communications should be addressed.

OLD members of Queen's College, Oxford, have invited the provost, Dr. Magrath, to a dinner in London, on the occasion of his appointment as Vice-Chancellor of the University, and also in recognition of his services to the college during the last thirty-three years. The dinner will take place at the Hôtel Métropole on Wednesday, January 16, with the Bishop of Winchester in the chair.

ON the occasion of Sir Henry Acland's retirement from the chair of medicine at Oxford, which he has held since 1858, it has been resolved to commemorate his services to the University and the city by some permanent memorial. This will take the form of a special fund of £10,000, to be used as a permanent endowment of the Sarah Acland Home for Nurses, which was founded in memory of his lamented wife.

THE General Board of Studies at Cambridge have presented a report on "Literary Training," suggested by a memorial most influentially signed, which began as follows:—

"It is the experience of many teachers in the University that a large number of the undergraduates do not possess adequate facility in the use of English, and are wanting in the power of presenting their ideas on paper in an orderly manner."

After consulting the several special boards, the General Board recommend generally that an essay paper might with advantage be introduced into the tripos examinations (excepting mathematics), and that in all cases a formal instruction should be given to the examiners to "have regard to the style and method of the candidates' answers, and to give credit for excellence in these respects." As regards the Previous Examination, they recommend the addition of a paper containing subjects for an English essay, selected from some standard English work.

LORD ROSEBERY has consented to receive a deputation, about the middle of January, to advocate the formation of a Teaching University for London on the lines recommended by the recent Royal Commission.

MISS ELIZABETH ANNA S. DAWES, who has just obtained the Degree of Doctor of Literature (in Greek), at London University, is understood to be the first lady to win this distinction.

DR. C. W. KIMMINS, of Cambridge and London, has been appointed to the secretaryship of the London University Extension Society, vacant by the return of Dr. Roberts to Cambridge.

ON the recommendation of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Sylvain Levi, of the École Pratique des Hautes Études, has been appointed to the chair of Sanskrit at the Collège de France, vacant by the death of M. Foucaux.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

A ROUNDEL OF YEARS.

ANOTHER year is dying,
Deck his bier,
While hither comes fast flying
Another year.
What aspect does he wear?
Loves he sighing,
Or holds he mirth more dear?
'Tis a vain thing trying
To see him clear.
Must wait—there's no denying—
Another year!

DORA CAVE.

OBITUARY.

WE regret to announce the death of Mr. Anthony Habib Salmoné, which took place at Beyrout, on December 20, at the age of sixty-five. His linguistic powers were of an uncommon order; and it is stated that he could speak, read, and write fluently in twelve languages. Mr. Salmoné achieved some reputation at the time of the massacres in Syria in 1860, which he was instrumental in making widely known in this country. His house in Newton-road, Bayswater, was the resort of many influential politicians, who sympathised with the oppressed Christians in Asiatic Turkey. Some years ago he was stricken by blindness, and was counselled by his medical advisers to take up his residence in Syria. He was the author of several publications on Eastern matters—in Arabic, French, and English; the best known being The Star of Bethlehem, an account of Palestine in 1860. Prof. H. A. Salmoné, who holds the chair of Arabic at King's College, is his eldest son.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE current number of the Economic Journal (Macmillans), which has now completed four years of existence, is not so interesting as some of its predecessors. The editor (Prof. Edgeworth) himself contributes a third and concluding instalment of his study on international value, in which he examines the theories of both English and Continental writers on the subject. As before, his article is "embellished with splendid illustrations." Mr. A. W. Fluss has a second paper on "The Commercial Supremacy of Great Britain," dealing this time with the distribution of trade with countries outside Europe. His conclusion is the same as before: that the bulk of English trade is growing steadily, and that there is no evidence of superior competing power on the part of our rivals. There are two articles on the recent financial legislation of the United States. Prof. F. W. Taussig, of Harvard, discusses the new tariff generally—with absolute impartiality, it need hardly be said; while Prof. Edwin R. A. Seligman, of Columbia, explains at considerable length the character of the new income tax. Under the heading of Notes and Memoranda, we may specially mention Prof. E. Böhm-Bawerk's re-statement of his views as to the ultimate standard of value, in reply to a criticism from Prof. Edgeworth; and the letter from Japan, by Mr. Jiuchi Soyeda, of the finance department at Tokio, which deals with the effect of the fall in silver, the rapid construction of railways by the government, and the first-felt economic consequences of the war with China—the ultimate consequences may be very different.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE NEW SYRIAC CODEX OF THE GOSPELS.

Oxford: Dec. 15, 1894.

Half of what I originally contended for on external and internal grounds is already generally conceded—that is, that in the new Syriac MS. we have the original text of St. Matt. i. 16. The question as to the genuineness of i. 1-17, to which I devoted the rest of my letter, is still undecided. In opposition to my excision, on various grounds, of these verses from the First Gospel, four theories are advanced which argue for their retention. Their authors are Mr. Conybeare, Mr. Badham, Mrs. Lewis, and Mr. Allen. I will deal as briefly as possible with them in this order.

As regards Mr. Conybeare, I must, I regret, write somewhat fully, though not with the fulness I intended. For the sake of brevity I am passing over several points that admit of easy rejoinder. However, to proceed at once to the task before me, let me adduce a passage from his letter in which, as I cannot regard him as disingenuous, I must adopt the other alternative and account him as guilty of culpable confusion of thought or judgment. He writes:

"Mr. Charles implies that Justin Martyr did not know of the genealogy; . . . but if Justin was not familiar with verses i. 1-17, how did he come to write (Dial. c. Tryph. 120) as follows?

"Μερίστει γὰρ τὸ σπέρμα ἐξ Ἰακώβ, καὶ Ἰούδα καὶ Φαρισαίων καὶ Δαυὶδ κατέρχεται; where Otto justly puts the note: 'Coll. Matt. i. 2, 3, 6.' Justin then had the genealogy."

Now, in the first place, Otto adds no such note in his third edition. If he did so in his earlier editions, it was an error that he subsequently removed. That the words quoted from Justin refer to the ancestors of Jesus by His mother's side is clear from the preceding words. These ancestors—Jacob, Judah, &c.—are there referred to as ἐξ ὧν ἐμελλεν ἔσθαι κατὰ τὴν οἰκονομίαν τὴν διὰ τῆς παρθένου Μαρίας ὁ Χριστός.

Furthermore, in ch. xliii. Jesus is said to be born of a virgin descended from Abraham, Judah, and David: in ch. xlv. to be born of a virgin of the lineage of David: in ch. c. "to be born of a virgin who was of the lineage of David and Jacob and Isaac and Abraham." Hence, as Justin in every instance traces the Davidic descent of Jesus through Mary, we are obliged to conclude that he had no such genealogy as St. Matt. i. 1-17 before him, and that Mr. Conybeare's statement stands in direct contradiction to the actual fact.

In a note, however, written possibly after revising his proof, he shows signs of having recognised the error of his way; for he there executes a volte-face and writes, "Justin clearly used some apocryphal gospel which boldly appropriated Joseph's genealogy to Mary." Was Mr. Conybeare conscious that he here conceded all that I originally maintained? I fear he was not, and yet it is not the less true. Justin Martyr, then, did not use the genealogy in St. Matt. i. 1-17, but one differing essentially from it. If, then, he used St. Matt. i. 18-25 (see Dial. c. Tryph. 78), and did not use i. 1-17, but a document decidedly at variance with it, we must conclude that his reason for so doing was that in his copy of St. Matthew our present text (i. 1-17) was not to be found.

Let us now deal with Mr. Conybeare's exegesis of St. Matt. i.; and as he depends therein so much on Philo's exegesis, we must touch briefly on the latter. Philo's exegesis forms, as a rule, the logical antithesis to every sound system of historical criticism and interpretation. It raised, in fact, the art of misinterpretation to the dignity of a science. It was to a large extent the offspring of certain a priori views on God, man, and creation. To these views the Biblical text had everywhere, willy nilly, to bear its attestation. Naturally, as the same passage is submitted to different methods in different connexions, his interpretations are at times mutually exclusive. Presenting, however, as they did such an easy means of evading difficulties, his methods readily got hold in some measure of nearly every subsequent age of Christian exegetes. From this fatal spell the present generation of textual and historical critics has been in great measure delivered, and, therefore, it is all the more strange to see it reasserting its sway in such a modern of the moderns as Mr. Conybeare; for in exegesis Mr. Conybeare exactly recalls the great Alexandrian. I will give two illustrations of what I mean. In the case of St. Matt. i. 19, he tells us indirectly, that if we are to get to the real fact behind the words, we must spiritualise them, for that the story they convey was originally a spiritual truth materialised in being written down in their present shape. We have, then, in the case of St. Matt. i. 19, to spiritualise the text. In the next piece of exegesis, on i. 25, we have to materialise; for by a quotation from Philo he shows that the phrase "he knew her not" is only a spiritual way of saying that Joseph and Mary were both worthy people, but that we are not to suppose that it describes a literal fact. By no means, the literal fact, if we must have it, is that Joseph did know Mary and was the natural father of Jesus.

If Mr. Conybeare were conscious of the gulf that divides Palestinian and Egyptian Judaism, he would not have committed himself to such exegesis as the above. It goes without saying that, since Palestinian and Egyptian Judaism held many fundamental truths in common, there were many affinities between them; but never were two schools of believing Judaism in the ancient world so widely sundered as those of Philo and Palestinian Pharisaism; and from the latter, we must bear in mind, Christianity came forth. Nay more, one must practise the greatest caution in applying the ideas and methods of Philo even to the products of Egyptian Judaism of the same century, unless these were affected by his influence or shared in the same type of thought.

* Mr. Conybeare will, I hope, pardon me for my intrusion into that province in literature on which he is one of the greatest living authorities.

My last words to Mr. Conybeare will, I hope, be duly considered by Mr. Badham; for if the former needs to be admonished in this respect seven times, then Mr. Badham needs to be admonished seventy times seven. It is hard indeed to take his exegesis seriously. If he does so himself, I fear others will not. And the reason is not far to seek; for, according to the principles of historical criticism and exegesis, we must study the passage to be interpreted in its environment. This is exactly what Mr. Conybeare and Mr. Badham have not done. The environment of the passage under consideration is certainly not to be found in Philo, where Mr. Conybeare has sought it, much less in ancient Aristotelian speculation and late Talmudic lore with Mr. Badham. This is obvious to every scholar who has studied both Palestinian and Egyptian Judaism.

When Mr. Badham turns from constructive to destructive criticism, and bizarre fancies and Midrashic conceits are put aside, he proves himself a force that must be reckoned with. Some of his objections to the excision of St. Matt. i. 1-17 are undoubtedly strong, yet not insurmountable. Their consideration, lest I should be too prolix, I must adjourn for the present.

Mrs. Lewis's theory that in i. 1-17 we have a copy of the Temple register is very reasonable. Mrs. Lewis would regard this register, I presume, as ending originally with the words "and Jacob begat Joseph, and Joseph begat Jesus." Then the relative clause, "to whom Mary the Virgin was betrothed," would naturally be added by the writer of the Gospel, or else by its final editor. I know of no other reasonable explanation of this clause. But can we regard the genealogy as in any sense an historical register? I trow not. For a discussion of this question, however, I must refer the reader to the last paragraph of this letter.

Mr. Allen, in his interesting letter on this subject, accepts not only the originality of i. 16, but also that of vv. 21 and 25 in the Syriac MS. He brings, it is true, no fresh documentary or external evidence to bear on the discussion, nor does he attempt to meet the evidence that conflicts with his view. It is bold indeed to follow the text of this MS. in i. 21 (i.e., "bear to thee") for which there is not a shred of evidence outside the Syriac, and likewise its omission in i. 25 (of "and knew her not till") for which only the support of one Old Latin codex can be cited, while for the addition "to him" after "she bare" no support of any kind in any text or version is to be found. It should be observed further that the text of this Latin Codex k is demonstrably a secondary one in i. 16. Hence its text, in connexion with i. 25, should be used with extreme caution.

This theory, therefore, being so weak on the side of documentary or external evidence, can only be saved in case the internal evidence is irresistible. Is it such? Let us examine it from this point of view. Mr. Allen declares that "the account of the Nativity in Cod. Sin. is homogeneous and consistent throughout." This conclusion he arrives at through his theory of interpretation. In this interpretation we have no fresh thought, but only our old friend, the theory of Joseph's legal fatherhood applied not merely to i. 16, but to the exegesis of the entire chapter. If students in time past have been dissatisfied with its limited application to i. 16, what will their feelings be now?

However, not to prejudice it, let Mr. Allen's interpretation, stated in unvarnished terms, speak for itself. First of all, in reading i. 16, we are to supply the word "legally"—"And Joseph, to whom Mary the Virgin was espoused, begat [legally] Jesus." Next, in i. 21, we find the angel instructing Joseph in the duties of a legal Jewish father—"Fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife, and she shall bare to thee [legally] a son, and thou [as the legal father] shalt call His name Jesus." Finally, in i. 25—"She bare to him [legally] a son, and he [as the legal father] called His name Jesus." I think many, on hearing this piece of exegesis, will re-echo the remark addressed to me by a well-known Jewish scholar, in reference to this interpretation of Mr. Allen—"I want no more Midrashim." The verdict as to its validity may, I think, be safely left to sound English common-sense.

I have now only to add a few words in support of the positions in my former letter. In the first place, my contention, on external and internal grounds, that we had the original text of St. Matt. i. 16 in the New Syriac MS. is steadily gaining acceptance both in England and in Germany. As for my second—i.e., that in i. 1-17 we had a document conflicting in purport with i. 18-25—I have seen as yet no reason for departing from it. On the other hand, I have found additional reasons for maintaining it. Of these I will content myself with adducing six.

1. The first is that pointed out by Dr. Nestle, that "eight out of the twenty-four MSS. used by Wordsworth and White begin v. 18 literis capitalibus vel rubricatis," and that "two of these MSS. have here at v. 18 the actual heading, 'Incipit Evangelium secundum Matthaeum.'" In this phenomenon we find a survival, mainly unconscious, of the primitive form of the First Gospel.

2. Since Tatian has retained such an anti-Encratite statement as St. Luke ii. 48: "Thy father and I have sought Thee sorrowing," it is idle to urge that his omission of the genealogies is due to his Encratite views. The genealogies, therefore, were wanting in his copy.

3. I have shown above that Justin Martyr had no such genealogy as i. 1-17 before him.

4. An attempt was made to get rid of the genealogies early in the third century, on the ground of their being fictitious narratives; but this movement was squashed by the orthodox literalist Africanus, partly by means of evidence which he said was derived directly from the brethren of Jesus, but which no critic nowadays will credit.

5. The genealogy i. 1-17 was, according to the testimony of Epiphanius, found in the Cerinthian "Gospel according to the Hebrews." Cerinthus, the heretic, was, according to tradition, the contemporary of the Apostles Peter, Paul, and John.

6. But, finally, however we may regard the relation of the genealogy to the text, it is not an historical document. I urged in my former letter that it was an heretical one. I must now further urge that its claims to be an historical register are groundless. In the first place, we have serious omissions of links in the line of direct descent. Now this in itself would not deprive it of credit; but when we take this circumstance in combination with the additional fact that this omission is not accidental, but necessary in order to produce a genealogical scheme duly balanced and fashioned according to the sacred numbers three and seven, then at once we discover the cloven hoof. For in Jewish pseudopigraphic literature three and seven, or any multiple of seven, have a tremendous rôle to play, and in proportion as they come into the foreground the truth of actual fact vanishes. The genealogy can only have originated in a mind steeped in Rabbinical conceits, and lost to the supreme importance of historic truth.

R. H. CHARLES.

Dec. 26, 1894.

P.S.—The above was an answer to Mr. Conybeare's letter in the ACADEMY of December 8. Since that date Mr. Conybeare has tacitly withdrawn the particular form of the theory there advocated, and re-issued it in last week's ACADEMY, in a shape in which he seeks to evade the objections to his view which I pressed upon him privately and which I now publish. But the new form of Mr. Conybeare's theory is just as untenable, critically and historically, as the old one, and this I hope to show later with the permission of the editor.

Cambridge: Dec. 22, 1894.

Major Conder asks whether the new Syriac Gospel is not supposed to date only from about the ninth century A.D.

The answer to this is, that it underlies an Estrangelo text whose date is clearly written in the verso of the last leaf. The words are: "Eashtallam den katba beethantha alef wa taha' . . . da Aleksandrus lemakedonia Bar Ph . . . us."

This I copied in February, 1892; and it was one of the signs which led me to perceive the value of the earlier Gospel text and to photograph the whole MS.

When Mr. Rendel Harris first saw it, in February, 1893, he suggested that the syllable in might have occupied the place of a very small hole in the vellum which follows after taha' and that so the word might be tesh 'in "ninety." We therefore adopted the date of A.D. 778 for the second writing. I may add that the late Prof. Bensly examined the passage in my presence, and gave no indication of dissent from my reading of it. In fact, the words are too distinct to admit of doubt. There is also the palaeographical evidence, which the photographs published along with the text place within the reach of all Syriac scholars.

With regard to the problem raised by Matt. i. 16-25, there is one little word which seems to indicate that the genealogy with which the Gospel begins was pre-supposed by the Evangelist. It is the conjunction et, Syriac den, of verse 18, "Now the birth," or "And the birth of the Christ was in this wise." A conjunction, whether copulative or disjunctive, usually points to something which precedes. It would really be more appropriate if we were to translate "But the birth," for this would show that the author of the Gospel was aware of the inconsistency which puzzles us.

St. Luke offers us a simple solution of the enigma, when he tells us (chap. ii. 19), that Mary kept all these things (including, no doubt, the Annunciation) pondering them in her heart. We shall perhaps realise this better if we try to imagine what the effect would have been if Mary had disclosed the facts at once. Either her story would have been disbelieved, and Joseph would have had no choice but to repudiate her, or it would have been believed. In the latter case the whole Jewish nation, nay, the whole world perhaps, would have worshipped her child as the Son of the Highest. There would have been no opposition to His preaching thirty years afterwards, and no Crucifixion. The Kingdom of God would, contrary to its own nature, have come to us with worldly pomp and observation. We are at liberty to suppose, with Mr. Charles, that the real Gospel begins at Matt. i. 18, and yet that the preceding genealogy was affixed to it by the Evangelist himself.

AGNES S. LEWIS.

Göttingen: Dec. 21, 1894.

Allow me to call attention to the fact that the text of the Old-Latin Version of Matt. i. 16 is likewise found in the Greek MS. 346, which has ἰωσήφ ὁ καὶ μετὰ τὴν γέννησιν αὐτοῦ ἐγέννησεν Ἰησοῦν τὸν λεγόμενον χριστὸν, instead of ἰωσήφ τὸν ἀνδρα Μάρκας, κ.τ.λ., which is found in all the other Greek MSS. This is the more remarkable as this MS. is written as late as the twelfth century. Compare Gregory in Tischen-dorf's edit. viii. maj. (vol. iii., p. 1251, 528).

ECCLESIASTES AND THE BOOK OF JOB.

Oxford: Dec. 23, 1894.

Mr. Tyler, whose book I shall expect with great interest, has made two little omissions in his reference to myself in his last letter. First, he has taken no notice of the word "undoubted"; and next, he has not given the date of the book from which he does me the favour to quote. An "undoubted reference" is one which all critics must agree to own, and which can therefore be cited as an evidence of date. That Job was written before Ecclesiastes is, in fact, rendered in the highest degree probable by the reference which I cited. Mr. Tyler cites other parallels between Job and Ecclesiastes (in its present form); but the phraseological points of contact are scarcely so striking as that in the decisive pair—Job i. 21 and Eccles. v. 14 (15). Still, I should put the first of Mr. Tyler's parallels next after these, and thank him for reminding me of it. As to the date of my book (1887), it leaves time enough for me to have made progress in the study of Job. That Job is post-exilic I have since 1887 repeatedly said; and this conclusion—if correct—at once makes it probable that there is a closer relation between the writer of the main part of Job and the author of Ecclesiastes (apart, as I must still say, from the Epilogue) than would otherwise be supposed. For help in determining the nature of this relation, I look to Mr. Tyler's new book. The reaction against legalism in the post-exilic period was evidently strong.

NOTES ON SOME OGHAM INSCRIPTIONS IN IRELAND.

Cambridge.

III.

During the week ending October 14, I made a second tour in Ireland, in which I visited and transcribed several of the Ogham inscriptions in that country which I had not previously seen. The results of this tour are embodied in the following notes, which I preface with a few additional particulars respecting Oghams already commented upon.

I. Tintern, co. Wexford.—I made a long detour along a very bad road in order to revisit this fragment, but, to my astonishment and dismay, found that it had disappeared; what has become of it I cannot tell.

III. Claragh, co. Kilkenny.—I had no time to return to this stone; but it may possibly be found that my reading is open to criticism at one point—the concluding letters of the patronymic. Prof. Rhys informs me that he read Macor(bi), while Sir Samuel Ferguson made Magr(ette); thus both agree on the last traceable letter being an r. I read t; but my first impression when I examined the stone was that the three scores of the t crossed the stem-line, making ng—in any case, I could only trace three, not five. But I felt very doubtful about the crossing; and as the scores above the stem-line are bolder than their apparent continuations below it, and, moreover, as they are perpendicular to the stem-line, I chose Macot in preference to Macong.

IV. Gouran, co. Kilkenny.—A second examination of this inscription, under slightly more favourable circumstances than on my previous visit, has confirmed me in reading adierucias magi on the left angle and the top of the stone; but I now agree with Mr. Brash in reading the right angle upwards and obtaining d go muc There are obscure traces of a q preceding the first letter of the inscription of the left angle, itself preceded by a vowel with an indeterminate number of points; the d on the right angle is also preceded by a vowel, apparently o.

There is one feature about the inscription on the left angle which is of interest. Between the i and the e of [ig] adierucias is a single score, occupying the place of an h, but rather shorter, narrower, and shallower than any other of the consonantal scores. I noted this mark on my former visit, but was inclined to take it as an accidental mark on the stone; I now think it artificial and probably intended as a divisional point, either to distinguish the two sets of vowel-points one from another or else to divide the long series of letters preceding magi into two words, [ig] adi Erucias. Perhaps it would not be too much to suggest that Erucias and Ercias are identical, the former differing from the latter by the insertion of the short vowel which, in accordance with the universal Celtic custom, was most probably pronounced between the r and c of this name. Compare Coribiri with Corrbri, Cairbre, and Olacon with Ulcagni.

VI. Trillick, co. Kilkenny.—The reading of this inscription, already published—is not correct. The h is not confined to the upper side of the stem-line, but forms one of the following group of stem-crossing digits. The sequence of vowels aua looks very improbable: there may have been another vowel-point between the first a and the u, fusing these two vowels into an i; but we cannot verify this now, as a flake has been recently knocked off the inscribed angle, carrying away the first a and the space which would be occupied by this hypothetical vowel-point.

Although the inscription has been reduced by mutilation to an unintelligible fragment, there are, nevertheless, some points of interest connected with it. First, the fact, already noticed by Prim and others—that the stone is of the same material (sandstone) as the fine round tower which stands in the churchyard, while the old church, and the whole of the surrounding district, are of limestone throughout—is, perhaps, not without its significance. Further, the mutilation of the stone, whatever its purpose, was the result of some definite plan, and not due to mere caprice or accident; for a regular line seems to have been drawn across one face to guide the stonecutter in his work of destruction. Lastly, whatever the original height of the stone may have been, the inscription was long enough to cover one angle and extend over another; for on the right-hand angle of the eastern face, just under the fracture, is to be seen a single vowel-point. (The inscription commences on the left-hand angle of the same face.)

VII, VIII. Dunbell, co. Kilkenny; IX. Kilbeg, co. Waterford.—These inscriptions are now in Kilkenny Museum. Owing to several causes, my visit to that museum was a very hurried one; I was, therefore, unable to do more than make a careful examination of the inscriptions borne by these three stones. The Topped Mountain, Ballydoolough, Hacketstown and Hook Point Oghams, which I had been led to expect to find in the museum, were not to be seen there, nor could the attendant who accompanied me point them out.

The Dunbell Stones read:

Bran^ettos magi Decc^edda

Savvigeqi Ttuddattac—

and are so read by Sir Samuel Ferguson; except that he makes D^occ^edda in the first of the two. Mr. Brash's readings of both stones are erroneous.

The inscription on the Kilbeg Stone seems to be correctly read by Mr. Brash, Bivodon mucoi Atar, though, owing to want of light, I could not satisfy myself as to the certainty of the tu of Atar.

X. Kilrush, co. Waterford.—The old church and churchyard of Kilrush are so much overgrown with rank grass, nettles, and other weeds that, if this stone be still in situ, it is most effectively hidden. I failed utterly to find it.

XI-XIV. Kilgrovane, co. Waterford.—It will be convenient, in dealing with this most interesting quartette of stones, as well as with other groups of inscriptions elsewhere, to follow the order adopted by Mr. Brash.

1. This stone is imperfect at the lower end. The scores commence at the extremity of the angle, and there is now no blank space for burial in the ground.* The inscription runs up the left angle over the top and a little way down the right angle. Except for a slight fracture, three inches long, at the top, every score is perfect and legible. The inscription reads—na magi Lugudeca mucoi Tjonea, the last three scores of the i and the first score of the T being damaged by the fracture. This agrees with Sir Samuel Ferguson's reading, except that he gives the patronymic as Matoni. I could not see any sign of the Ma, and the final vowel must certainly be resolved as I have given it. Mr. Brash has so resolved it; but he has fallen into the error of reading the right angle upwards, and not continuously with the rest of the inscription.

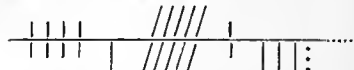

2. Mr. Brash's description of this stone is correct. The final i of Nisigni is very faint, and the m of magi is perpendicular to the stem-line.

3. This stone, of which the coarseness of the engraving presents a marked contrast to the neatness of the scores of the other three stones, has suffered badly at the hands of the authorities. Mr. Brash describes it as having an inscription on one angle, commencing at 1 ft. 7 in. from the bottom, and running close to the top, so worn, however, that only the letters ireuoc could be traced. Sir Samuel Ferguson merely says that it "bears excessively coarse and now illegible indentations, but evidently Oghamic." As a matter of fact, the stone is inscribed on three angles; one of these is quite illegible, but with a little patience and care the inscription on the other two angles can be deciphered with tolerable certainty.

The stone is a flag, in the shape (roughly speaking) of an isosceles triangle, standing so that one face is turned towards the sea, the other towards the land. I obtained the length, 4 ft. 5 in.; breadth at bottom, 1 ft. 10 in.; thickness, 4 in., tapering to a point at the top. These measurements do not agree with those given by Mr. Brash, but he seems to have had the advantage of seeing the entire stone uncovered; at present it is standing in the earth, and the inscription runs down to the level of the ground-line.

The inscription commences 3 ft. 8 in. from the ground on the right angle of the landward face; is carried over the top, and occupies the whole of the exposed part of the left angle of the same face; and was probably concluded on the right angle of the seaward face, the legend of which is now illegible. It runs as follows:—

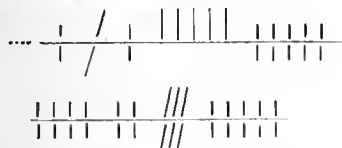

First angle, reading upwards:

* To assert, as some have done, that these inscriptions, or any parts of them, were originally intended to be concealed under the earth, is to cast reflections upon the intelligence of their ancient engravers and their modern students.

The last remaining score of the last character is faint, but traceable; I suspect a fifth is lost. The top is fractured and scaled, nine inches of the inscription being thus rendered undecipherable. Considering the size of the scores, however, there is little difficulty in restoring the missing characters.

Second angle, reading downwards:

Third angle, reading upwards:

The legible part of the inscription thus simply reads $Ebra^{(s)}_n$ maqi Eongi. I think I can vouch for the accuracy of this transcript.

I found that the entire inscription could be distinctly read (with the exception, of course, of the broken part at the top) by standing at some little distance from the stone.

4. Here again there is a perplexing difference of opinion among the authorities. According to Mr. Brash the inscription reads Maqiunni mucoi Cuneu, the first five letters, and the initial score of the sixth, being on a loose fragment which he found lying near. Sir Samuel Ferguson gives Olni mucoi Cunuu; while the Rev. D. H. Haigh, in a paper on the "Earliest Inscribed Monuments of Britain and Ireland," gives a third reading, I know not on what authority—Cualgni mucoi Cuneu.

With Mr. Haigh I read the second name Cuneu: each of the final vowels consists of three perfect and one abraded score. As to the first name, it certainly ended in -gni, as the n is preceded by a damaged g, of which the first score is perfect and the second has lost its upper half; the remaining parts are oblique, and therefore neither l nor c could possibly be correct. The angle is fractured before the g, and the rest of the name has gone: I could not find Mr. Brash's fragment, and it is clear that he did not copy its inscription correctly, as his transcript is not consistent with a terminal gni.

MILLER'S EDITION OF SCRIVENER'S
"INTRODUCTION."

A Plain Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament By F. H. A. Scrivener. Fourth Edition, edited by E. Miller. In 2 vols. (Bell.)

DR. SCRIVENER passed away just three years ago. At that time the third edition of his valuable work was eight years old; and in spite of age, illness, parish cares, and other literary occupation, he had already made many notes of corrections or additions for a new issue. The publishers entrusted the revision of the work to the Rev. Edward Miller, who had already shown much interest in textual questions, and who was fortunate in securing the help of numerous scholars specially versed in various fields of research. The single volume has given place to two: the first is devoted to Preliminary Considerations (pp. 1-20), General Character of Greek MSS. of the New Testament (pp. 21-55), Divisions of the Text, &c. (pp. 55-89), Description of the Greek MSS. of the New Testament, &c. (pp. 90-389), and two indices for the MSS., scribes, &c. (pp. 391-418); while the second volume contains Ancient Versions (pp. 1-166, with appendices, pp. 413-416), Quotations from the Fathers (pp. 167-174), Printed Editions (pp. 175-243), Internal Evidence (pp. 244-256), History of the Text (pp. 257-273), Recent Views of Comparative Criticism (pp. 274-311), Character of the Dialect of the New Testament (pp. 312-320), and two indices of Scripture passages and of subjects for both volumes (pp. 417-428).

The editor has made diligent use of the materials that had accumulated since the issue of the third edition; and but few pages, apart from those which are devoted to the expression of Dr. Scrivener's own opinions or feelings, remain untouched. The addition of a large number of Greek MSS. enhances the value of the first volume. The present writer must emphasise his own sense of thankfulness for the great courtesy shown by Mr. Miller in quoting from the fresh matter in the Prolegomena to Tischendorf: it is rarely the case that such self-denial is exercised towards a brother worker who is bound by earlier promises to make further use of his own researches. It would seem invidious to point out slips in this transfer; and most of them have doubtless already urged themselves upon the editor's notice, with the alacrity so well known to all who have had the misfortune to see their MS. return to them in the shape of an unalterable printed page.

The most notable contribution to the volumes is that upon the Latin Versions, which everyone will concede to be the most important aids to the determination of the Greek text, at least at the present stage of our knowledge. This contribution combines the results of the profound studies of the triumvirate, Wordsworth, Sanday, and White, in fifty pages, chiefly from Mr. White's hand, but under the supervision of Bishop Wordsworth, and with the help of the French leader in Vulgate work, M. Samuel Berger. Until one of these men, or perhaps Dr. Peter Corsen, of Berlin, gives to the world an exhaustive treatise upon the Latin Versions, their mutual connexion and their relations to the Greek text as well as to modern Versions, we are not likely to advance beyond this part of Dr. Scrivener's book. For the Syriac Versions Mr. Miller received the aid of Messrs. Gwilliam, Deane, Waller, Hall, and Bensly the lamented. Mr. Headlam, aided by Mr. Horner, revised thoroughly the chapter on the Egyptian Versions, which was originally written by Bishop Lightfoot. Mr. Conybeare's valuable and interesting account of the Armenian and Georgian Versions recalls his discoveries which, among other things, have thrown so much light upon the end of St. Mark's Gospel (we suppose that Mr. Conybeare's article in the Expositor for 1893 appeared too late to be mentioned under Mark xvi. 9-20). It is puzzling to read upon page 156 (vol. ii.) of "the accompanying collations," and then not to be able to find a trace of them anywhere. Doubtless Mr. Miller was compelled to cut them out for lack of room. Could not Mr. Conybeare publish them separately? He would oblige us all if he would at the same time kindly add Papias, Hegesippus, and Hippolytus out of some of the huge tomes at Etzschmiadzin.

Of course in two large volumes of this kind there is much that a critic would like to see changed; but a large percentage of what is objectionable is merely reproduced from Dr. Scrivener's third edition, and can therefore not be laid so directly to the charge of his new editor. One might, for example, wish that Mr. Miller had changed "propose" (vol. i., p. 21) to "purpose," or that on p. 10 he had referred to the similarity of pronunciation in the case of v and β, or that on the same page he had cut out the remark about itacisms as especially prevalent from the eighth to the twelfth century, and so on. But all wishes seem futile; for Mr. Miller has neglected not only a few corrections suggested in the Academy, January 26, 1884, but also a large number which were made in other publications. Among the many errors which have passed undisturbed from the third to the fourth edition, it seems strange that the editor should not have struck out the false M on p. 172 (vol. i.), since he has upon both p. 171 and p. 172 at least hinted at the right letter.

But only those who have done similar work can sympathise fully with Mr. Miller's difficulties in taking up, apparently at short notice and with limited time at his disposal, such an arduous task; and the present writer, living in a house built of Prince Rupert's drops, has no wish to throw stones at him. On the contrary, he offers him many thanks for his work, whether done "by others" or "by himself," and repeats his sense of personal gratitude.

CASPAR RENÉ GREGORY.

CURRENT SCIENTIFIC LITERATURE.

Dr. William Smellie and his Contemporaries. By John Glaister, M.D. (Glasgow: Maclehose.) The pious author of this handsome volume has employed his scant leisure well, though it cannot be said that he has thrown much new light upon old material, or made any thrilling or even interesting discoveries. Of Smellie the man, it seems that very little is known; but Dr. Glaister has given us at any rate his environment in vivid detail. Of Smellie the distinguished, perhaps epoch-making, obstetrician, there is here an exhaustive memoir and patriotic criticism, which justify the claim of the work to be a contribution to the history of midwifery in the eighteenth century. A great deal of space is given to dreary notices of totally undistinguished contemporaries of Smellie, he and she-midwives and their battles long ago. But we forget and forgive them and the provincialism of the editor when we light upon the name of Dr. Tobias Smollett and learn that, besides continuing Hume, he positively revised Smellie; and, as Dr. Glaister sententiously remarks, after rebuking the indifference of a former editor to a point of such moment: "We read Smellie with a greater degree of interest, knowing that the work of a master in the obstetric art has been subjected to the revision of a celebrated master in the literary craft." The Sydenham edition of Smellie's works is familiar, but nowhere reminds us of Humphrey Clinker. We are told that it is more than probable that Smollett and Smellie left Scotland for London together, but not a hint is given us as to which of the two was Random and which Strap. The Latin quotations abound in bad grammar; and we cannot believe that the hexameters quoted on p. 330 ever passed muster even in a Scotch school. The type and illustrations are worthy of the University publishers.

Cloudland: A Study on the Structure and Characters of Clouds. By the Rev. W. C. Ley. (Stanford.) In spite of the careful observations and learning enshrined in this essay, Mr. Ley does not flatter himself that much advance is made by it towards the prognostication of weather. The science of nephology, he says, "is at present necessarily somewhat tentative and provincial"; and, again, "it would be a mistake to imagine that experience in cloud observation enables a man, in the middle and higher latitudes, to part with his barometer and to dispense with all weather study as at present understood." It may, however, direct observers of the clouds when to walk secure of a coming shower, when to cut hay, or when to carry an umbrella. The author is, at all events, hopeful. He thinks that "very soon the wives and children of the sailor, the troubled soul of the agriculturist, will cease to call to us in vain." At present plain people, by homespun wit, settle questions of weather for themselves and the most advanced nephologists can do little more. Much weather teaching is to be found in this book. Fogs, winds, cyclones, dust particles, the diurnal oscillations of atmospheric pressure, and the like, are carefully treated. The author only allows himself two poetical descriptions of cloudland. Mr. Ruskin's gorgeous prose paragraph on it might well be added. Half-a-dozen coloured plates meritoriously attempt to catch the fleeting tints of cloud scenery; but Mr. A. Clayden's beautiful cloud photographs which are here introduced are much more striking and, of course, more faithful. Mr. Ley's diagrams are instructive. It is a pity that he has not adopted a more fruitful science for his painstaking investigations.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CAPANAGA'S BASQUE TRANSLATION OF THE SPANISH CATECHISM OF RIPALDA.

Vich, Cataluña: Dec. 13, 1894.

The ACADEMY was so good as to mention the new edition of Capanaga which was published a year ago to-day. A list of some of the mis-prints in it has appeared in the Revue de Linguistique (tome xxvii.). But, as I am responsible for the book, I hope that I may take leave to say a word or two on a few points which are not quite clear. On p. clxxv., instead of "the oldest Spanish-Basque book that is left to us," one must read "the oldest printed Spanish-Basque," &c. For the invaluable MS. book of Rafael de Micoleta, which was very badly printed in the second volume of La Revista de Ciencias Historicas (Barcelona, 1881), and which Prof. Vinson has entirely omitted from his bibliography (like those of Paulus Merula and Colmenar), bears the date of 1653, and is therefore interesting as being a contemporary of Capanaga, whose language it much resembles.

On p. 148, instead of egun guren egunena one must read eguen guren egunean, as I almost decided to have it printed. I guessed from the first that the meaning must be "on the day of Holy Thursday," but I was unable to find in any dictionary or glossary this rendering of those English words. They are not represented in the Castilian text by the side, and none of my correspondents gave me any enlightenment. I had therefore to publish the words as they appeared in the MS. copy supplied to me for this page. I cannot recall any dictionary which gives gur in the sense of "holy" and "venerable," but it is easy to see that it means this. Eguen is the common word for Thursday in Biscayan, and it is sometimes written Eguben or Egumen. But I have lately come across, in the Revista de Ciencias Historicas (Barcelona, 1881), the invaluable, but unfortunately unalphabetical, Dictionary of Araquitzain, the friend of Larramendi. This book, like those of Nicolas Antonio, Bullet, Hervas, &c., has been omitted by Prof. Vinson in his chronological catalogue and in his list of authors, though he mentions it and them in his notes on others. Now Araquitzain says: "Jueves Santo, egiten ona, santua; egitenguren, ó egunguren eguna"—that is to say, "Holy Thursday, the good, the holy Thursday, the day of venerable Thursday." It is evident, then, that the change mentally made by me in the text is duly warranted and wanted. On p. 153, the original text at the end has iriguiaic, etañqabalac. But the original text is full of misprints. However, my conviction was from the first, the Castilian text opposite being here not quite a literal version, that the meaning must be "open and that wide (open)." Not having, however, at hand or in mind any Basque text to warrant this interpretation of the otherwise superfluous a between eta and qabalac, I determined, in a weak moment, to leave it out. I have, however, since then come across, in the Biscayan book entitled Jesucristo Jaunaren Legue Santia Domingo de Canala Echevarria ganic. Guerniquen: Antonio Egurrolaren Suloteguayan 1893 garren urtian (p. 45), the following words: Gomutau eguizue (eta au gutzijoc), meaning: "Bethink you, and that (au) all (of you)," where au stands in exactly the same position as the unjustly excluded a of Capanaga—so I wish to have a replaced between eta and qabalac.

SCIENCE NOTES.

MR. E. J. ALLEN has just been appointed director of the marine biological laboratory at Plymouth, in succession to Mr. E. J. Bles. Mr. Allen was a pupil of Prof. Schultze, of Berlin, and has been engaged in researches upon the coelomic and nervous systems of Crustacea.

THE municipal council of Paris have passed a resolution to change the name of the Rue d'Ulm to that of Rue Pasteur.

AT the meeting of the Geologists' Association, to be held on Friday next at University College, Mr. George F. Harris will read a paper on "The Analysis of Oolitic Structure," illustrated by the oxy-hydrogen lantern.

Natural Science, which has hitherto been published by Messrs. Macmillan, now finds itself able to undertake its own publishing business, and in future will be issued by Messrs. Rait, Henderson & Co., at 22, St. Andrew Street, E.C. It has made this fresh start, very happily, with the most generally readable number (January) yet issued; and we take the opportunity of wishing our contemporary continued prosperity.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

DR. JOSEPH WRIGHT, deputy professor of comparative philology at Oxford, has issued an appeal for helpers to supply him with additional material for the English Dialect Dictionary, which he has undertaken to edit. This dictionary will represent, so far as possible, the complete vocabulary of all dialect words which are still in use, or which have been in use at any time during the last two centuries, including all literary words that are used locally with some peculiarity of meaning. It will also contain: (1) the exact geographical area over which each dialect word extends, together with quotations and references to sources; (2) the exact pronunciation, according to a simple phonetic scheme specially formulated for the purpose; and (3) the etymology, so far as relates to the immediate source of the word. The materials consist, in the main, of those collected by the English Dialect Society during the past twenty years, and printed in the seventy volumes of their publications, supplemented by all other available glossaries and books containing dialect words. Dr. Wright now appeals for assistance, partly to put the existing material in order on convenient slip, and partly to provide additional material—from the spoken language, from works written partly in dialect, from sporting novels, magazines, &c. In short, he wants a staff of "readers," such as Dr. Murray has found so valuable for the New English Dictionary. But he insists that such help can be usefully rendered only in accordance with the principles laid down in his circular; for otherwise volunteer contributions may give more trouble than they are worth. Dr. Wright's address is 6, Norham-road, Oxford; and we may add that Prof. Skeat is the treasurer of the fund that is being subscribed for the publication of the dictionary.

WE have received Part VII. of Dialect Notes, published by the American Dialect Society (Boston: Cushing). It contains a list of members, numbering 184, among which we notice only four from England, including Dr. Henry Sweet and the Birmingham Free Public Libraries; a report of the annual meeting for 1893, which was held at Washington in December; a scheme, proposed by Dr. George Hempl, of Michigan, to compile a speech-map out of answers to test questions from all parts of the country; a statistical study of unaccented i, in such words as "palace," "fountain," "baked," by Mr. C. H. Grandgent; a supplementary list of Spanish and Mexican words used in Texas, by the late Prof. H. Tallichet; a list of "Jerseyisms," or words used chiefly along the coast of New Jersey—among which we notice Fenimore Cooper's "anan?," "boughten," as opposed to home-made, "jack" for apple-whiskey, "nary" = never, "singing sand," and "weal and winegar" are good wittles to take aboard a wessel"; a similar contribution for Western Connecticut—where we notice "caterin" = diagonally, "Dutchman" = any foreigner who speaks broken English, "housens" as plural of house, "pair of stairs," "stale" = the handle of a tool, and "Them cattle aint yourn, be they?" ; and a bibliography of dialect notes that have appeared during the last two years in the Dial, Modern Language Notes, and the Nation. Finally, the secretary (Mr. Babbitt) expresses the opinion that dialect proper is almost confined to the older parts of the States—that is, to the east and the south—while in the territory north and west of the Ohio, containing a population of about thirty millions, there is almost absolute uniformity of speech.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

ELIZABETHAN SOCIETY.—(Wednesday, Dec. 5).

FREDERICK ROOERS, Esq., in the chair.—Mr. Sidney Lee read a paper on "Thomas Nash, Satirist." Mr. Lee, after referring to the neglect which had overtaken Elizabethan prose-literature as compared with the attention bestowed on the lyrical and dramatic poetry of the period, pointed out that the reading public of Elizabethan England mainly sought its recreation in prose romances or pamphlets of news. The probable number of books published during the reign of Elizabeth amounted to 7000, and of that total more than 6000 were in prose. Theological tracts and sermons formed a large proportion of the whole; but the recreative literature of romance or news-sheet made an imposing display on the Elizabethan bookseller's stall, whether quality or quantity was concerned. To the production of recreative literature in prose very able pens were consecrated. In the absence of newspapers and in the presence of a growing demand for news, a competent pamphleteer was offered an opportunity of performing many of the functions of the modern journalist; and, although criticism of public persons and of public measures might expose the critic to severe, and even to capital, punishment, men were at times bold enough to jeopardise their lives in an endeavour to bring forbidden opinions to the notice of the public. Thomas Nash effectively illustrated the function and the temper of the Elizabethan prose-writer. The son of a poor Lowestoft clergyman and a graduate of St. John's College, Cambridge, he first essayed literature in 1589, at the age of twenty-two, in a pamphlet called The Anatomy of Absurdity, and in a preface to Greene's "Menaphon." In both he sought to scourge those contemporaries whom he regarded as literary impostors. Next he flung himself into religious controversy, and then devoted himself to denouncing in a series of forcibly abusive pamphlets the Cambridge scholar and pedant, Gabriel Harvey, who had defamed the memory of Nash's dead friend, Greene. The battle between Nash and Harvey lasted from 1590 to 1597; and in 1599 the Archbishop of Canterbury, in the interests of public decency, ordered all the publications connected with it to be suppressed. With a versatility characteristic of the age, Nash had meanwhile sought laurels in more peaceful paths, by producing in 1594 his Unfortunate Traveller, a Life of Jack Wilton, a work of fiction recklessly intermixed with history, something in the manner of Defoe. The book may be said to have inaugurated the novel of adventure in England. In 1597, an endeavour on Nash's part to convert his satiric power to dramatic purposes led to his temporary imprisonment in the Fleet, but the "Isle of Dogs"—the comedy which constituted his offence—was lost. Finally, in 1599, he produced his Lenten Stuffe, an account of the city of Yarmouth and a buxleque panegyric on the red herring. Nash died in 1601, aged only thirty-four, enduring to the last the extremes of poverty. The unrestrained naturalism of his style, Mr. Lee said, recalled the tone of Rabelais, with whose writings he was clearly acquainted. The readiness of his pen, his appreciation of genuine literature, his scorn of imposture, and the variety of the departments of letters which his hand invaded, suggest that combination of qualities which constitute the efficiency of the modern journalist.

STATISTICAL.—(Tuesday, Dec. 18.)

MR. GEOFFREY DRAGE read a paper on "Alien Immigration." He said that he had pointed out elsewhere that we are making our way in England to a new dividing line in politics—namely, that between Socialism and Individualism, between state interference and self-reliance. In the course of such a transition the combatants are not likely always to be clear as to the principles at stake: there are now Conservatives who advocate state pensions for the aged poor, and Liberals who still believe in freedom of contract. It is not, then, surprising that, with regard to alien immigration, the two parties have taken up positions which are at variance with the political principles they seem likely to adopt, and were in keeping with their immediate political past. In order, however, to understand the question of alien immigration in England, it is first necessary to take a survey of the movement of the population of the whole globe. The result of such a survey will show that England can adhere to the liberal policy hitherto adopted, by which it has benefited so much in the past. Economically the alien seems likely, on the whole, to do us good; politically—thanks to the common sense of the working man—he appears unable to do us harm. In our colonies and in our Indian Empire the question takes a different form, and requires a different answer; while abroad, and especially for countries of the European continent, difficulties arise which, though easy of solution to us in England, are to them both politically and economically matters of life and death. For such subjects as those treated in his paper, large maps, statistical as well as political, are necessary. Mr. Drage dealt at length with the population question in Europe, and further, not only with the transoceanic emigration from Europe, but also with movements like that of Coolie labour from our Indian Empire to the different Crown Colonies, that of Chinese labour to Australia and America, as well as to different parts of Asia, and all the questions connected with Kanaka labour in Queensland. He pointed out what immense services are rendered to us by the protective legislation of our Indian Empire in this respect, and what a bond of union that Empire forms between colonies as distant and dissimilar as those in the West Indies and Africa. He referred in detail to the restrictive legislation in the United States and the Colonies, and the encouragement given to immigrants in South America republics before the recent commercial crisis. He commented on the failure of state-aided emigration, not only in South America, but in the case of the Crofter Settlements in Manitoba; and he further drew attention on the one hand to the invasion of New England by the French Canadians, on the other hand to the counter movement from the United States into the North-West Territory of Canada, and to the benefit derived from freedom of migration in both cases. In connexion with the restriction of immigration, Mr. Drage referred to the Anarchist movement in France, and pointed out that, in his report to the Labour Commission a year ago, he had prophesied the Anarchist outbreaks which had since taken place, at a time when no such occurrences were anticipated. He indicated, in conclusion, the important part which the distribution of the world's labour force is likely to play in the politics of the twentieth century.

FINE ART.

ART BOOKS.

George Romney and his Art. By Hilda Gamlin. (Sonnenschein.) We wonder as we turn over the pages of this ill-written, foolish book if the author ever considered for a moment whether she had any qualifications whatever for the task she undertook. It is a curious case of either self-deception or want of literary conscience. Romney is no inconsiderable figure in the history of art or in the history of humanity. The distinct beauty and originality of his work (which in some qualities is matchless), the powerful influence over it (if not over Romney as a man) of that lovely witch Lady Hamilton, and the strange, pathetic history of his married life, afford biographical material with which only a clear brain and a skilful hand could adequately deal. Fortunately the stage is still left open, and among the sins (heavy enough) of the writer of this pitiful performance is not to be reckoned that of having blocked the way of more competent writers. She has made use of no material [which is not common property; she has written nothing which demands the slightest recognition or attention from the student of Romney. For them the book—if, indeed, it can be called a book—does not exist. The presentable appearance of a volume and the pretences of its illustrations are often redeeming features to a second-rate text; but in this case the text is not even second-rate, and they aggravate rather than diminish the offence.

Guide to the Italian Pictures at Hampton Court. By Mary Logan. (Innes.) In the modest guise of one of the twopenny pamphlets of the Kyrle Society, Miss Logan here gives us a most admirable summary of the results of the new method of art criticism, which we owe mainly to the genius of the late Signor Morelli, though she has been careful to include the more recent studies of Mr. Berenson. While in form a guide to the Italian pictures at Hampton Court, her work is in substance a running comment upon the history of painting in Venice during the seventeenth century—the latest blossoming of the flower of the Renaissance. By treating her subject in strict chronological order, and by the help of references to pictures in other English galleries, she has been able to avoid the usual jejune catalogue, and to invest her subject with abundant human interest. It is the least of her merits that she brings into prominence the few genuine works, and brands the copies and imitations as they deserve. Incidentally, we may mention that she claims for the little-known Venetian painter called Morto da Feltre the painting of "A Concert," which has usually been attributed to Lotto. We know of no better introduction than this little pamphlet for those who may be desirous of understanding aright the exhibition of Venetian art that is shortly to be opened at the New Gallery.

THE last volume of the Gentleman's Magazine Library (Elliot Stock) is devoted to the subject of Ecclesiology, under the editorship of Mr. F. A. Milne. Its contents, however, are restricted to extracts of general interest in connexion with our ecclesiastical fabrics; since matters of local interest only, and curious points of detail confined to particular churches, are relegated to the volumes dealing with topography. The first article discusses the date of the very interesting structure, familiar to many pedestrians visiting the neighbouring town of Folkestone, at Lyminge; and from it there branched out several learned disquisitions, from the Rev. R. C. Jenkins, the Rev. J. F. Dimock, and Mr. J. H. Parker, on some curious terms in ancient architecture, and on the substance in which ecclesiastical buildings of the tenth century were constructed. An elaborate article follows on the characteristics of the churches in Worcestershire, many of which, witness Malvern, Pershore and Evesham, are familiar to all enthusiasts in church-building; and this again is succeeded by several papers on sculpture as necessary to architecture, progress of stained glass in England, church organs, towers and bells, and on figured tiles and mosaics. An essay on our Cathedrals in 1634 disproves many of the assertions which are current as to the damage done to them by the Parliamentarians, and a series of articles on cathedral schools confirms some of the charges which have been brought against the Chapters respecting their neglect of their scholastic foundations. Mr. Mackenzie Walcott contributes much information from returns in the Record Office, and from other ancient documents, on the charities which formerly existed in English cathedrals, and on the chief events which happened in their history down to the end of the fifteenth century. Articles like these must not be neglected by the inquirer into the past of the chief ecclesiastical fanes in our land.

The Old Churches of our Land. By Francis Baldwin, Architect. (S.P.C.K.) An intelligent interest in Church architecture is just what the venerable S.P.C.K. ought to encourage, and the issue of this well-illustrated little volume will help to develop it. The ignorance that prevails on the subject, even among educated people, is wonderful. Not long ago the writer was showing a very grand and ancient church to a party of tourists. One of them, who had followed his explanations with special interest, remarked in sorrow and surprise that it appeared to have been built by Roman Catholics; and all of them seemed to learn for the first time that the same building may exhibit successive styles of architecture and thus chronicle its growth. As cycling is opening up the remoter districts of our land to "wheelmen," an acquaintance with the village churches would form a better object of ambition than blindly "beating the record." This handy book would certainly never be found an incumbrance, and often a very useful companion.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THERE will open next week, at the Dudley Gallery, an exhibition entitled "The Expressionists, A.D. 1250-1890, as they chance to be represented in the Private Collection of an Old-Fashioned Critic."

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish shortly an English edition of Schreiber's Atlas of Classical Antiquities, with a new explanatory text written by Prof. Anderson, of Firth College, Sheffield. Prof. Percy Gardner contributes a preface.

A LARGE etching by Mr. G. A. Manchon, after Sir Frederick Leighton's picture of "Hit"—which all will remember in last year's Academy—is to be presented to the subscribers to the Art Journal for 1895.

THE editorial committee of the New Spalding Club have approved the publication of an "Iconographia Scotica Septentrionalis," being a catalogue raisonnée of extant portraits, original or engraved, of eminent persons connected with the North of Scotland, with reproductions of selected examples.

AT a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Couve, of the French School at Athens, submitted a report on his excavations at Delos. His work was devoted to private houses, of which several of the largest and richest have been laid bare, all dating from the first century B.C. They all have open courts, and show that the description of a Greek house given by Vitruvius is by no means so fanciful as has been supposed. The most remarkable thing about them is the inside decoration. Besides fine ornamental paintings on stucco, M. Couve found capitals bearing heads of lions and bulls, a pseudo-archaic bas-relief representing a procession of deities, mutilated heads in which may be recognised the influence of fourth century sculptors, Roman heads much better preserved, and, above all, a replica of the Diadumene of Polykleitos, in an admirable state of preservation, far finer than that of Vaison.

MUSIC.

"HÄNSEL AND GRETEL."

THE success of E. Humperdinck's work in Germany has been immense; and Mr. George Edwardes will not, we imagine, regret his arrangement with the Carl Rosa Company for its production at the Daly Theatre, where it was given for the first time on Wednesday evening.

The composer made a bold venture. His sister, Frau Adelheid Wette, prepared for him a libretto based on one of Grimm's fairy tales; and he wrote music for it of the simplest kind as regards the melodic material, complex, however, as regards the structure. Many of the themes sound like snatches of nursery or kindergarten tunes, but they are worked upon true Wagnerian lines. The idea of such a work fortunately came into the head of a musician well able to realise it. Humperdinck possesses knowledge, skill, and experience. By knowledge, we mean specially of Wagner's music and method: so strongly, indeed, is he imbued with the spirit of this master's music, that there are many reminiscences of the "Ring" and of "Die Meistersinger" in "Hänsel and Gretel." Every page of the score bears testimony to its composer's contrapuntal skill: not the skill of a pedant, but of a master who makes it a means, not an end.

There is no trace of effort in the music, yet a perusal of the score with its developments and combinations of themes shows that it must have cost much thought. The orchestration throughout is characteristic and effective. In the first act all the music for Hänsel and Gretel is light and graceful, and the change when the scolding mother enters is marked: the merry opening melody sung by the children is worked up into an agitated accompaniment. The song of Peter, the broom-maker, has a strong family likeness to a well-known nursery song: it will thus be appreciated by children, while older folk can admire the way in which it is developed. The ballad which Peter sings has much character—the orchestration of the opening symphony reminds one, by the way, of Meyerbeer. The instrumental description of the Witches' Ride is clever, and the little song sung by Gretel in the wood which follows offers a striking contrast: in the one, full orchestra is employed, while in the other pizzicato chords from the strings with a few passages for wind-wood form the sole accompaniment. The music of the scene in the wood represents the composer at his strongest. It closes with the prayer of the children, followed by the appearance of guardian angels. The stage effect is charming. In a story of tragic importance the visit of angels might prove dangerously realistic; but here the stage picture is in keeping with the fairy story. The closing portion of the opera—the scene with the witch, and the casting of her into the oven—is amusing, but it is not the best part of the work; and the rescuing of the many children whom she had kidnapped from their gingerbread coverings forms a tame conclusion. The tale, charming enough in itself, does not furnish a strong ending; but the composer has accomplished wonders with it. If only as a reaction against the unhealthy tone of modern opera and against its sensational plots and situations, "Hänsel and Gretel" is welcome. Is the composer perchance a quiet satirist?

Of the performance, a few words must suffice. The children were well represented by Miss Marie Elba (Hänsel) and Miss Jeanne Douste (Gretel); but the former decidedly carried off the palm. Mr. Charles Copland was an excellent Peter; Mme. Julia Lennox as the wife, and Miss Edith Miller as the witch, both deserve a word of commendation. The orchestra, under the direction of Signor Ardit, was far from good, and many points in the intricate music were lost. But the piece was hastily prepared, and Christmas time does not offer the most favourable opportunities for proper rehearsal. In this matter there will, no doubt, soon be an improvement. We ought to mention that the English version of the libretto has been written by Miss Constance Bache.

The Humperdinck opera was preceded by a little one-act piece—"Bastien and Bastienne"—composed by Mozart at the age of twelve. For so young a boy it was undoubtedly a clever production; but the plot is tame, and if the opusculum is to have a fair chance, some of the silly dialogue ought to be cut out. Miss Jessie Hudleston was fairly effective in the part of Bastienne. Bastien and Colas were played by Messrs. Brophy and Claus.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

THE University of Dublin has conferred the Degree of Doctor of Music, honoris causa, upon Mr. Ebenezer Prout, the new professor of music.

MESSRS BAYLEY AND FERGUSON, of Glasgow, will publish immediately Ancient Scots Ballads, with the traditional airs to which they were wont to be sung, edited by Mr. George Eyre-Todd, with harmonies for the pianoforte by Mr. Emile Berger. The volume contains forty-seven old ballads, the airs restored from tradition and from the older song collections throughout which they are scattered. Music is supplied for each verse that is intended to be sung; a short introduction is prefixed to each ballad; and in most cases, where too long for singing throughout, a résumé of the entire ballad is added on a separate page. Among the contents are "The Dowie Dens o' Yarrow," "The Gaberlunzieman," "The Wife o' Usher's Well," "Sir Patrick Spens," and "Tamlane."

AGENCIES.

London Agents, Messrs. W. H. SMITH & SON, 186, Strand.

Copies of the ACADEMY can be obtained every Saturday Morning in EDINBURGH of Mr. MENZIES; in DUBLIN of Messrs. EASON & SON, 40, Sackville-street; in MANCHESTER of Mr. J. HEYWOOD. Ten days after date of publication, in NEW YORK, of Messrs. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS.

THROAT AND COUGH

EPPS'S GLYCERINE JUJUBES.

In contact with the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, the glycerine in these agreeable confections becomes actively healing.
